CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1881.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President of the United States, having taken the oath of office at the close of the last regular session of the Forty-sixth Congress, took the chair.

PRAYER.

Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and ever-living God, the Father of all our mercies and the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, whose power no creature can resist, as Thy dependent creatures and as the subjects of Thy moral government it becomes us to make acknowledgment of Thee in all our ways and to render obedience to all Thy commandments, ever remembering that all our prosperity comes from Thee. We thank Thee, O God, for all Thy great and continued goodness to us as a people, for Thou hast blessed us above all the nations of the earth; Thou hast given us this goodly land as our heritage, a land of light and of liberty and of rich abundance. We pray that we may never forfeit by our ingratitude and disobedience the inestimable blessings of civil and religious liberty bequeathed to us by our fathers and purchased with their blood; but may we long remain a united and godly and prosperous people, ever enjoying Thy favor, which is life, and Thy loving kindness, which is better than life.

And now, our Father, we would offer our sincere and earnest prayers for Thy servants, the President and Vice-President elect of the United States, who are this day to be inaugurated in the highest offices within the gift of this great people. May they be plenteously endowed with wisdom from on high to guide and assist them in the discharge of the high trust that has been committed to them; may they be a blessing and an honor to their country and to the whole world.

We would also pray for the Senators called to meet in executive session to co-operate in carrying on the affairs of this Government. May all that they do redound to Thy glory and the best interests of our common country.

These blessings we ask for Christ our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

PROCLAMATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proclamation of the President convening the extraordinary session of the Senate.

The Secretary (Mr. JOHN C. BURCH) read as follows:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive:

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, have considered it to be my duty to issue this my proclamation declaring that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene for the transaction of business at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on the 4th day of March next, at twelve o'clock at noon on that day, of which all who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the 28th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1881, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and fifth.

[SEAL.] R. B. HAYES.

By the President:
WM. M. EVARTS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I am requested to state that the Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, of Iowa, is confined to his room by indisposition.

INAUGURATION CEREMONIES.

The persons entitled to admission on the floor of the Senate Chamber having been admitted to the places reserved for them, the President, Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio, entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by the late President, Hon. RUTHERFORD B. HAYES, and Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. ANTHONY, members of the committee of arrangements, and was escorted to a seat in front of the Secretary's desk, and the late President and the members of the committee were seated on his right and left.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will now execute the order of the Senate relative to the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States.

Those in the Senate Chamber proceeded to the platform on the central portico of the Capitol in the following order:

The marshal of the District of Columbia and the marshal of the Supreme Court.
Ex-Presidents and ex-Vice-Presidents.
The Supreme Court.
The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.
The Committee of Arrangements.
The President and the President-elect.
The Vice-President and the Secretary of the Senate.
Members of the Senate.
The Diplomatic Corps.
Heads of Departments.
Members of the House of Representatives and Members-elect, governors and ex-governors of States, officers of the Senate and officers of the House of Representatives.
All other persons who have been admitted to the floor of the Senate Chamber.

The President-elect delivered the following

INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: We stand to-day upon an eminence which overlooks a hundred years of national life—a century crowded with perils, but crowned with the triumphs of liberty and law. Before continuing the onward march, let us pause on this height, for a moment, to strengthen our faith and to renew our hope by a glance at the pathway along which our people have traveled.

It is now three days more than a hundred years since the adoption of the first written Constitution of the United States—the articles of confederation and perpetual union. The new Republic was then beset with dangers on every hand. It had not conquered a place in the family of nations. The decisive battle of the war for independence, whose centennial anniversary will soon be gratefully celebrated at Yorktown, had not yet been fought. The colonists were struggling not only against the armies of a great nation, but against the settled opinions of mankind; for the world did not then believe that the supreme authority of government could be safely intrusted to the guardianship of the people themselves.

We cannot overestimate the fervent love of liberty, the intelligent courage, and the saving common sense with which our fathers made the great experiment of self-government. When they found, after a short trial, that the confederacy of States was too weak to meet the necessities of a vigorous and expanding Republic, they boldly set it aside, and in its stead established a national Union, founded directly upon the will of the people, and endowed with full power of self-preservation and with ample authority for the accomplishment of its great objects.

Under this Constitution, the boundaries of freedom have been enlarged; the foundations of order and peace have been strengthened; and the growth of our people, in all the better elements of national life, has vindicated the wisdom of the founders and given new hope to their descendants. Under this Constitution, our people, long ago, made themselves safe against danger from without, and secured for their mariners and flag equality of rights on all the seas. Under this Constitution, twenty-five States have been added to the Union, with constitutions and laws, framed and enforced by their own citizens, to secure the manifold blessings of local self-government.

The jurisdiction of this Constitution now covers an area fifty times greater than that of the original thirteen States, and a population twenty times greater than that of 1780.

The supreme trial of the Constitution came, at last, under the tremendous pressure of civil war. We ourselves are witnesses that the Union emerged from the blood and fire of that conflict purified and made stronger for all the beneficent purposes of good government.

And now, at the close of this first century of growth, with the inspirations of its history in their hearts, our people have lately reviewed the condition of the nation, passed judgment upon the conduct and opinions of political parties, and registered their will concerning the future administration of the Government. To interpret and to execute that will, in accordance with the Constitution, is the paramount duty of the Executive.

Even from this brief review it is manifest that the nation is resolutely facing to the front, resolved to employ its best energies in developing the great possibilities of the future. Sacredly preserving whatever has been gained to liberty and good government during the century, our people are determined to leave behind them all those bitter controversies concerning things which have been irrevocably settled, and the further discussion of which can only stir up strife and delay the onward march.

The supremacy of the nation and its laws, should be no longer a subject of debate. That discussion which, for half a century, threatened the existence of the Union, was closed at last, in the high court of war, by a decree from which there is no appeal, that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are and shall continue to be the supreme law of the land, binding alike upon the States and upon the people. This decree does not disturb the autonomy of the States nor interfere with any of their necessary rights of local self-government; but it does fix and establish the permanent supremacy of the Union.

The will of the nation, speaking with the voice of battle and through the amended Constitution, has fulfilled the great promise of 1776 by proclaiming "liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof."

The elevation of the negro race from slavery to the full rights of citizenship, is the most important political change we have known since the adoption of the Constitution of 1787. No thoughtful man can fail to appreciate its beneficent effects upon our institutions and people. It has freed us from the perpetual danger of war and dissolution. It has added immensely to the moral and industrial forces of our people. It has liberated the master, as well as the slave, from a relation which wronged and enfeebled both. It has surrendered to their own guardianship the manhood of more than five million of people, and has opened to each one of them a career of freedom and usefulness. It has given new inspiration to the power of self-help in both races, by making labor more honorable to the one and more necessary to the other. The influence of this force will grow greater and bear richer fruit with the coming years.

No doubt this great change has caused serious disturbance to our southern communities. This is to be deplored; though it was perhaps unavoidable. But those who resisted the change should remember that, under our institutions, there was no middle ground for the negro race between slavery and equal citizenship. There can be no permanent, disfranchised peasantry in the United States. Freedom can never yield its fullness of blessings so long as the law, or its administration, places the smallest obstacle in the pathway of any virtuous citizen.

The emancipated race has already made remarkable progress. With unquestioning devotion to the Union, with a patience and gentleness not born of fear, they have "followed the light as God gave them to see the light." They are rapidly laying the material foundations of self-support, widening their circle of intelligence, and beginning to enjoy the blessings that gather around the homes of the industrious poor. They deserve the generous encouragement of all good men. So far as my authority lawfully extends, they shall enjoy the full and equal protection of the Constitution and the laws.

The free enjoyment of equal suffrage is still in question; and a frank statement of the issue may aid its solution. It is alleged that, in many communities, negro citizens are practically denied the freedom of the ballot. In so far as the truth of this allegation is admitted, it is answered that, in many places, honest local government is impossible if the mass of uneducated negroes are allowed to vote. These are grave allegations. So far as the latter is true, it is the only palliation that can be offered for opposing the freedom of the ballot. Bad local government is certainly a great evil, which ought to be prevented; but to violate the freedom and sanctity of the suffrage is more than an evil—it is a crime which, if persisted in, will destroy the Government itself. Suicide is not a remedy. If in other lands it be high treason to compass the death of the king, it should be counted no less a crime here to strangle our sovereign power and stifle its voice.

It has been said that unsettled questions have no pity for the repose of nations. It should be said, with the utmost emphasis, that this question of the suffrage will never give repose or safety to the State or to the nation until each, within its own jurisdiction, makes and keeps the ballot free and pure by the strong sanctions of the law.

But the danger which arises from ignorance in the voter, cannot be denied. It covers a field far wider than that of negro suffrage and the present condition of the race. It is a danger that lurks and hides in the sources and fountains of power in every State. We have no standard by which to measure the disaster that may be brought upon us by ignorance and vice in the citizen when joined to corruption and fraud in the suffrage.

The voters of the Union, who make and unmake constitutions, and upon whose will hang the destinies of our governments, can transmit their supreme authority to no successors save the coming generation of voters, who are the sole heirs of sovereign power. If that generation comes to its inheritance blinded by ignorance and corrupted by vice, the fall of the Republic will be certain and remediless.

The census has already sounded the alarm, in the appalling figures which mark how dangerously high the tide of illiteracy has risen among our voters and their children. To the South this question is of supreme importance. But the responsibility for the existence of slavery did not rest upon the South alone. The nation itself is responsible for the extension of the suffrage, and is under special obligations to aid in removing the illiteracy which it has added to the voting population. For the North and South alike, there is but one remedy. All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States and all the volunteer forces of the people should be summoned to meet this danger, by the saving influence of universal education.

It is the high privilege and sacred duty of those now living to educate their successors and fit them, by intelligence and virtue, for the inheritance which awaits them.

In this beneficent work, sections and races should be forgotten, and partisanship should be unknown. Let our people find a new meaning in the divine oracle which declares that "A little child shall lead them;" for our own little children will soon control the destinies of the Republic.

My countrymen, we do not now differ in our judgment concerning the controversies of past generations; and fifty years hence our children will not be divided in their opinions concerning our controversies. They will surely bless their fathers and their fathers' God, that the Union was preserved, that slavery was overthrown, and that both races were made equal before the law. We may hasten or we may retard, but we cannot prevent the final reconciliation. Is it not possible for us, now, to make a truce with time, by anticipating and accepting its inevitable verdict?

Enterprises of the highest importance to our moral and material well-being, invite us and offer ample employment for our best powers. Let all our people, leaving behind them the battle-fields of dead issues, move forward, and in the strength of liberty and the restored Union, win the grander victories of peace.

The prosperity which now prevails is without a parallel in our history. Fruitful seasons have done much to secure it; but they have not done all. The preservation of the public credit and the resumption of specie payments, so successfully attained by the administration of my predecessors, have enabled our people to secure the blessings which the seasons brought.

By the experience of commercial nations, in all ages, it has been found that gold and silver afford the only safe foundation for a monetary system. Confusion has recently been created by variations in the relative value of the two metals. But I confidently believe that arrangements can be made between the leading commercial nations which will secure the general use of both metals. Congress should provide that the compulsory coinage of silver now required by law may not disturb our monetary system, and that neither metal shall be driven out of circulation. If possible, such an adjustment should be made that the purchasing power of every coined dollar shall be exactly equal to its debt-paying power in all the markets of the world.

The chief duty of the National Government, in connection with the currency of the country, is to coin money and to declare its value. Grave doubts have been entertained whether Congress is authorized by the Constitution to make any form of paper money a legal tender. The present issue of United States notes has been sustained by the necessities of war; but such paper should depend for its value and currency upon its convenience in use and its prompt redemption in coin at the will of the holder, and not upon its compulsory circulation. These notes are not money, but promises to pay money. If the holders demand it, the promise should be kept.

The refunding of the national debt, at a lower rate of interest, should be accomplished without compelling the withdrawal of the national-bank notes, and thus disturbing the business of the country.

I venture to refer to the position I have occupied on financial questions, during a long service in Congress, and to say that time and experience have strengthened the opinions I have so often expressed on these subjects.

The finances of the Government shall suffer no detriment which it may be possible for my administration to prevent.

The interests of agriculture deserve more attention from the Government than they have yet received. The farms of the United States afford homes and employment for more than one-half our people, and furnish much the largest part of all our exports. As the Government lights our coasts for the protection of mariners and for the benefit of commerce, so it should give to the tillers of the soil the best lights of practical science and experience.

Our manufactures are rapidly making us industrially independent, and are opening to capital and labor new and profitable fields of employment. Their steady and healthy growth should still be maintained. Our facilities for transportation should be promoted by the continued improvement of our harbors and great interior water-ways and by the increase of our tonnage on the ocean.

The development of the world's commerce has led to an urgent demand for shortening the great sea voyage around Cape Horn by constructing ship-canals or railways across the Isthmus which unites the continents. Various plans to this end have been suggested and will need consideration; but none of them has been sufficiently matured to warrant the United States in extending pecuniary aid. The subject, however, is one which will immediately engage the attention of the Government with a view to a thorough protection of American interests. We shall urge no narrow policy, nor seek peculiar or exclusive privileges in any commercial route; but in the language of my predecessor, I believe it to be "the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interests."

The Constitution guarantees absolute religious freedom. Congress is prohibited from making any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. The Territories of the United States are subject to the direct legislative authority of Congress; and hence the General Government is responsible for the violation of the Constitution in any of them. It is, therefore, a reproach to the Government that, in the most populous of the Territories, the constitutional guarantee is not enjoyed by the people and the authority of Congress is set at naught. The Mormon Church not only offends the moral sense of mankind by sanctioning polygamy, but prevents the administration of justice through the ordinary instrumentalities of law.

In my judgment, it is the duty of Congress, while respecting to the uttermost the conscientious convictions and religious scruples of every citizen, to prohibit within its jurisdiction all criminal practices, especially of that class which destroy the family relations and endanger social order. Nor can any ecclesiastical organization be safely permitted to usurp, in the smallest degree, the functions and powers of the National Government.

The civil service can never be placed on a satisfactory basis until it is regulated by law. For the good of the service itself, for the protection of those, who are intrusted with the appointing power, against the waste of time and obstruction to the public business caused by the inordinate pressure for place, and for the protection of incumbents against intrigue and wrong, I shall, at the proper time, ask Congress to fix the tenure of the minor offices of the several Executive Departments, and to prescribe the grounds upon which removals shall be made during the terms for which incumbents have been appointed.

Finally, acting always within the authority and limitations of the Constitution, invading neither the rights of the States nor the reserved rights of the people, it shall be the purpose of my administration to maintain the authority of the nation in all places within its jurisdiction; to enforce obedience to all the laws of the Union in the interests of all the people; to demand rigid economy in all the expenditures of the Government; and to require the honest and faithful service of all executive officers, remembering that the offices were created not for the benefit of incumbents or their supporters, but for the service of the Government.

And now, fellow-citizens, I am about to assume the great trust which you have committed to my hands. I appeal to you for that earnest and thoughtful support which makes this Government in fact, as it is in law, a government of the people.

I shall greatly rely upon the wisdom and patriotism of Congress and of those who may share with me the responsibilities and duties of administration. And, above all, upon our efforts to promote the welfare of this great people and their Government, I reverently invoke the support and blessings of Almighty God.

The oath of office was then administered to the President by the Chief-Justice of the United States.

The Senate returned to their Chamber, and the Vice-President took the chair at twenty-five minutes past one o'clock p. m.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed by the Vice-President to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether this implies that we are to wait until we receive a return from this message? If so, I should be opposed to it. For one, I want to adjourn and adjourn till Monday to the end that we may have some sleep, some recess from the weariness of which we have had so much. If this is only to send a committee, I will not object; and after the resolution is acted on, if I can get the floor, I will move an adjournment until Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. TELLER as the committee.

ADJOURNMENT AND HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. Is not that an unusual motion, to adjourn two days after having ordered such a communication to the President as has just been authorized?

Mr. CONKLING. One of the days is Sunday.

Mr. HOAR. While it might be proper while the committee are gone to adjourn till to-morrow, yet the President may have a communication to make to us to-morrow that will require us to be here. I hope the adjournment will be until Saturday.

Mr. PENDLETON. I feel very certain that it will be more agreeable to the Executive that the Senate shall adjourn until to-morrow and not until Monday. I have no desire to move a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from New York, but I have reason to know that it will be agreeable to the Executive that there should be a session to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Had the Senator from Ohio made that statement to me before he offered his resolution and had it acted upon I think I would have ventured to object to its consideration. I made an inquiry of him intending to elicit exactly that which he has now stated. I think that had the Senator understood the whole scope of my question he would have answered it. After what he has said I shall certainly not interpose any rest which I need or anybody else may need against what the Senator understands to be the convenience of the President. Therefore I change my motion and move that the Senate now adjourn and then it will meet to-morrow.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suggest that we had better fix the hour of meeting regularly at twelve o'clock, by resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Then to satisfy all Senators, first I move that the hour of meeting of the Senate, until otherwise ordered, be twelve o'clock noon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York offers the following order:

Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate, until otherwise ordered, be twelve o'clock meridian.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 5, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has certain petitions which have been placed in his hands to present to the Senate. They are petitions praying for special legislation. The Chair is of the opinion that such petitions cannot be received at an extraordinary session of the Senate. He finds that there are precedents to the effect that such petitions should be received and laid upon the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the petitions be laid upon the table until such time as the Senate shall meet in legislative session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last decision to which the Chair refers is to this effect:

It is not in order to present petitions or memorials praying for special legislation at a session of the Senate specially called by the President, in the recess of Congress, and which the Senate could not, without the co-operation of the House of Representatives, mature. (Special or called session of Senate, March 13, 1873.)

Under this decision it would not be in order for the Chair to present the petitions. The Chair being in doubt asks the Senate what order they choose to take, and he will take the sense of the Senate on the question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. My recollection is that this very question came up four years ago, and I think it was held by the Senate that the reception of petitions is always in order. They were received, and I think laid on the table. That is my recollection, and I think the Journal will show some such action as that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the petitions which the Vice-President has received be retained in the hands of the Vice-President, to be presented at the beginning of the legislative session.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to my honorable friend from Missouri to make that as a suggestion, not as a formal motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make it as a suggestion, then, that they be retained by the Vice-President to be presented when the Senate meets in legislative session.

Mr. CONKLING. Nobody, I imagine, objects to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the petitions will be so retained.

WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk, which I am sure it will give every member of the Senate pleasure to support.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Winfield Scott Hancock be entitled to the privileges of the floor of the Senate during his stay in Washington.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. BLAINE. I gave notice some weeks ago in the Senate that at the spring session I would offer a resolution upon a subject then under discussion; and I now offer the following:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to take into consideration the mode of voting for President and Vice-President of the United States, and the mode of counting and certifying the same, and to report such propositions for change in the laws or Constitution as may seem to them expedient. That said committee have power to sit during the recess of Congress, and that they be directed to report on or before the second Wednesday of January, 1882.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to considering the resolution at this time?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to my friend from Maine that he allow the resolution to lie on the table and be printed. That would be the better course, I think.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to that course if there is objection to considering the resolution now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PENDLETON. The committee which was appointed yesterday to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of this body had convened and was ready to receive any communication which he might desire to make, have performed that duty, and the President notified them that he would communicate to the Senate to-day at three o'clock. I move that the Senate take a recess until three o'clock.

WITHDRAWAL OF DUPLICATE CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, before he submits his motion, I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the following:

Ordered, That the duplicate credentials of Hon. OMAR D. CONGER be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to ask the object of the order.

Mr. FERRY. The original is on file, and the duplicate is not necessary, and the order is simply to withdraw it. Certainly there can be no objection, as the original is on file. I will say to the Senator that it may be a gratification to my colleague to obtain the duplicate, and, the original being on file, I trust the Senator from West Virginia will not object to this order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand that there are two sets on file?

Mr. FERRY. Two sets are on file, the original and the duplicate. I simply ask to withdraw the duplicate, leaving the original. Certainly there can be no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the order will be agreed to. It is agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. PENDLETON. I now renew my motion to take a recess until three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until three o'clock.

At three o'clock the Vice-President entered the Senate Chamber, and was greeted with applause by the galleries, as had been Mr. BLAINE on his entrance a few moments before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I presume that the galleries are filled with strangers, who are unacquainted with the rules and orders of the Senate. They should be made to understand that any manifestation of approbation or disapprobation is an insult to the body, and will lead immediately to the galleries being cleared.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that order is maintained in the galleries.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 7, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

WILLIAM B. ALLISON, a Senator from the State of Iowa, appeared in his seat to-day.

SWEARING IN OF A SENATOR.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the credentials of my colleague, Hon. William Mahone, have been read and placed on the files of the Senate. He is present, and I ask that he be now sworn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect will advance to the chair of the Vice-President, and the oath will be administered to him.

Mr. MAHONE advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. JOHNSTON, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868, having been administered to him he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and fourteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 8, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ROLLINS, it was Ordered, That Henry S. Wetmore have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That G. E. W. Sharretts have leave to withdraw the papers in his case from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was Ordered, That John Hunter have leave to withdraw his papers, which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR KIRKWOOD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, March 7, 1881.

SIR: I have forwarded to the governor of the State of Iowa my resignation of the office of Senator of the United States, to take effect from this date.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. J. KIRKWOOD.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR BLAINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1881.

SIR: You will please announce to the Senate that on the 5th of March I forwarded to the governor of Maine my resignation as Senator of the United States from that State.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAS. G. BLAINE.

To Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR,
Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. These communications will lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that they be placed on the files of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 9, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM IOWA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read and ordered to be filed:

[Telegram.]

DES MOINES, IOWA, March 8, 1881.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR,
President of the Senate, Washington, District of Columbia:

I have this day appointed as Senator Kirkwood's successor James W. McDill, of Afton, Union County.

JNO. H. GEAR, Governor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 10, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer a resolution, and I will state frankly that it is a resolution for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate. I am very well aware that it cannot be considered to-day except by unanimous consent. I hope that leave will be granted; but if it is intended to make objection I would suggest for the convenience of all parties that the list be not read, but printed and laid on the table. However, the Senate will pursue its own course in regard to the matter.

Mr. BAYARD, Mr. INGALLS, and others. Let it be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it be read, subject to objection.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It can be read anyhow; the objection comes afterward.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session:

Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress—Messrs. Voorhees, (chairman,) Butler, and Morrill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the resolution be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suppose it goes over regularly under an objection and stands upon the Calendar. I have no objection to the order to print, but I desire if the resolution is not to be considered immediately that it go on the Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. PENDLETON. Very well, let it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island move to lay the resolution on the table?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not move to lay it on the table if the Senator from Ohio objects. Let it go on the Calendar. The effect in either case is just the same.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let it lie on the table and be printed subject to be called up to-morrow. I think the Senator from Rhode Island desired that it should be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over one day under the rule. The order to print will be made.

Mr. PENDLETON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following select committees be appointed for the present session, and that each committee thus created be vested with all the powers and authorities heretofore given to each of the select committees on the respective subjects to which they relate:

SELECT COMMITTEES.

To examine the several branches of the Civil Service—Messrs. Hampton, (chairman,) Groome, Mahone, Logan, and Dawes.

To take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States—Messrs. Morgan, (chairman,) Bayard, Johnston, Garland, Maxey, Edmunds, Conkling, and Teller.

To investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of Epidemic Diseases—Messrs. Harris, (chairman,) Lamar, Garland, Jonas, Platt of Connecticut, Miller, and Sewell.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let this resolution take the same direction as the former, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 11, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

A message in writing of an executive character was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

SWEARING IN OF A SENATOR.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, my colleague is now present. I move that the oath of office be administered to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect will advance to the chair of the Vice-President and the oaths of office will be administered to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. MORRILL, and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 1, 1862, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR WINDOM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read, and ordered to be filed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 10, 1881.

SIR: I have forwarded to the governor of the State of Minnesota my resignation of the office of Senator of the United States to take effect on the 7th instant.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM WINDOM.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate copies of any reports made during the last session of Congress to the Department of Justice in relation to the conduct and operations of the United States marshal and his deputies, the district attorney, and the commissioners in the western district of Virginia.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution which I offered yesterday, and which went over on objection under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio will now be reported by the Clerk.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PENDLETON for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate during the present session, and having read the list of the Committee on the Judiciary,

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that by mistake in copying the name of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] was put upon the Judiciary Committee, whereas it ought to have been the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to correct the clerical error of the copyist.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the correction will be made.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the proposed list of standing committees.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will yield to me one moment, I understand the resolution offered yesterday is taken up on motion. I do not myself understand it to be in order, and although I have just entered the Senate and may be mistaken, I wish to reserve, in spite of the Senator's occupying the floor, any point of order to which it may be subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, before casting my vote on this occasion, it is proper for me to state the reasons that determine it. In 1877 the Legislature of Illinois unexpectedly elected me Senator. I was not in any sense a candidate for this honor, and when applied to for the use of my name I declined to answer the request. Numerically the republicans had a plurality of that Legislature, and my distinguished colleague [Mr. LOGAN] was their nominee. The democrats stood next in strength, and a small body of independents held the balance of power. The two last united, and they voluntarily conferred upon me the distinction which I now hold. No man ever entered Congress freer from political committals or from personal obligations than I did four years ago. I had been identified with the republican party and still look back with pride to its grand achievements. The extreme measures after the war and the excesses incident to civil strife drove tens of thousands into the liberal movement of 1872. I found myself in company with Charles Francis Adams, Horace Greeley, Carl Schurz, Stanley Matthews, Reuben E. Fenton, Murat Halstead, Charles Sumner, Lyman Trumbull, Samuel Bowles, John Wentworth, Whitelaw Reid, Leonard Swett, and others known to fame, who had been conspicuous republicans. Some of them have returned to the fold from which they had separated, doubtless prompted by patriotic motives.

I have never acted distinctively with the democratic party, and unless its methods change and its wisdom is broadened there is little prospect of my revising opinions calmly formed. The country would be materially benefited by a reconstruction of parties, especially since the errors of one seem unhappily contrived to prolong possession of power in the other. Standing between these two great organizations, and exposed to the carpings of the organs of both, who regard independence of party as a crime, is not an agreeable position to occupy; but it has suited my politics, because I could not accept either extreme. I have voted on all public measures, without regard to their political origin, according to my convictions of right, and I propose to continue that course until the close of my senatorial term. Dreams of ambition do not disturb my sleep. When the day for retiring comes I shall go back to private life, as I came out of it, carrying with me the consciousness of having striven to discharge every duty.

An honorable recognition of the trust generously confided to my keeping by democratic votes in 1877 requires me to sustain the existing organization of the Senate, for which I disclaim all responsibility. Parts of it are neither agreeable to my taste nor to my judgment. I do not refer to the formation of committees.

In giving this vote it is proper to say, whatever may be the result, that I can accept no honor at the hands of either side. A new administration is starting out under exceptional circumstances. The States were numerically divided at the Presidential election. A few thousand votes separated the two principal candidates in a poll exceeding nine millions. Both branches of Congress are almost balanced. The country craves a respite from angry discord, and, most of all, it needs rest from sectional strife. The voice of patriotism demands peace and fraternal fellowship, North and South, East and West. Every good citizen should desire the success of the administration, for we all ought to have a common interest in the glory and in the greatness of the Republic. Measures intended to advance either shall have my cordial support. The President and his Cabinet are entitled to a fair hearing, and to be judged impartially by their acts. If they fail to justify the public confidence, it will be a misfortune which has overtaken other administrations having equally good intentions and prospects.

It follows from what I have said that I shall vote for the formation of all the committees as reported by the Senator from Ohio, except the Committee on the Judiciary. I wish to retain my old place on that committee; and profoundly thankful to my democratic friends for the distinguished honor of being placed at the head of that committee, I must decline that position.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Illinois, if it is his purpose not to accept the position assigned him on the committee, that he himself move to amend the resolution of the Senator from Ohio by striking his name from the head of the list of the committee and inserting it at some other place in the line of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The next person named on the committee is the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] I therefore move that Mr. GARLAND be placed at the head of the committee in my place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks that the name of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] be substituted in the place of his own as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and that he take the place which had been assigned to the Senator from Arkansas. If there be no objection the substitution will be made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ventured some time ago to save any point of order which lies against this proceeding. I do not understand that this is in order. There is a rule of the Senate which provides the mode in which the committees of the Senate may be elected, and that is the only mode. This resolution does not proceed under that, nor has notice of one day been given, as is required by one of the rules of the Senate, that a motion would be made to suspend the rule which stands in the way of this proceeding. Therefore, although the resolution has lain over one day, and as a resolution it is in order if no other rule of the Senate interferes with it, being a resolution proposing to construct the committees of the Senate in a way not tolerated by the rule, that rule must be suspended, and that suspension can happen only on notice—notice descriptive, in a way pointed out by the rule, and that notice must be at least one day. Unless there has been in the Senate something which has escaped my observation I respectfully submit that this resolution is not in order, and if it be not in order I do not wish it considered.

Mr. PENDLETON. On the question of order I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the forty-sixth rule:

> In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint, severally, the chairman of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

The rule in its terms contemplates the election by ballot unless the Senate takes other order. The other order, I submit, is contained in the resolution which is now under consideration by the Senate. It is not a suspension of the rule of the Senate; it is not a violation of the rule of the Senate; it is a proceeding provided for by the forty-sixth rule, which does itself contemplate that there are two modes of appointing the committees, both within the power of the Senate, and that the one shall be adopted unless the other shall be expressly ordered. So much upon that point.

As to the other point, if it were a suspension of the rules, I submit that the notice necessary has been given by the offering of the resolution itself. I call the attention of the Chair to the interpretation put upon language similar to this during very many years in the Senate, and notably during the last Congress, where upon both the Anthony rule and the Harris rule the very language of this rule, in so far as it applies, was adopted, and yet every Senator knows that without notice, under the words "unless otherwise ordered," we proceeded day by day, upon a vote of the Senate, to take up other business than that which was provided by the rule itself.

Mr. HARRIS. By a majority vote.

Mr. PENDLETON. By a majority vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware that it is not in order for me to discuss this point of order,—no more in order than it was for my distinguished friend from Ohio to do the same thing; but as he has delighted the Senate by a few observations, they will endure I hope a few from me. This resolution proposes:

> That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session.

"During the present session." If an apology is needed for the objection which I feel to that, it will be found, I think, in the circumstance that a majority, a constitutional majority of the Senate, is against that resolution, is against the formation of committees democratic in inspiration and persuasion, to which are to go for this session all executive matters, whether treaties or appointments, and to which if they be perpetuated are to go the great measures of legislation upon which policy and public concerns so much depend. I say a constitutional majority of the Senate is against that; and yet I do not forget that one Senator has been stricken and has left this Chamber forever, and that he who has been elected to succeed him has not yet reached here with his credentials in his hands. I do not forget that three other seats, by the transplantation of those who held them to another forum of public duty, are vacant, and that those who are to succeed to those seats are not all here with their credentials on file. Still I repeat that a constitutional majority of the Senate is against that management and régime which this resolution proposes.

So, Mr. President I stand for one to insist upon the execution and fruition of that political result which came from the last election, and which confided not to the democratic party but to another party the executive and the legislative branches of the Government.

Such being the attitude, and there being vacant chairs here, as I have not forgotten to remind the Senate, it is proposed on the Friday preceding that Tuesday when, if I am correctly informed, all of these seats will be filled, to elect for the present session all the committees of the Senate, the purpose of course being that the party which now prevails from the vacancy of chairs, that party which has sought, and sought in vain it seems, an alliance with the independent party of the Senate, shall by the force of its own votes do that which on Tuesday next or on Wednesday next it could not do.

It may be said, very likely I shall be found to say despite some criticism that I may make upon so saying in advance, that notwithstanding the words "during the present session," day after to-morrow or the day after that, if the majority then present in the Chamber changes, that majority may overthrow all this proceeding, obliterate it, and set up an organization of the Senate in conformity with and not in contradiction of the edict of the election. But I do not think that should be done if it can be avoided; I do not think that an organization of the Senate should be a game of bounce, that it should be a trip and twitch affair to be done in one way to-day and to-morrow, if for any reason one more vote is found on one side and one less on another, that an attempt should be made to change it. That, I think, should be the last resort in a contingency of this kind.

Therefore I have aimed my point of order at what I deem premature action, believing it to be the most decorous and convenient mode of letting the organization of the Senate, or the proposal to make it, wait that little interval of days, of which Sunday is one, until all these chairs are occupied, and until the organization can be made, not for a day, not to be put up in a raffle of political or coalition contingencies, but to remain, as the resolution proposes, "during the present session."

I have ventured to say so much to explain my reasons for interposing a point of order which ordinarily would not arise because unanimous consent would waive it; but now the honorable Senator from Ohio challenges that point, and I beg to submit in a very few words the ground on which I think it stands. Rule 46 provides:

> In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint.

Rule 61 declares—

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing—

And now I beg the attention of the honorable Senator from Ohio to the words I am about to read—> specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

So that before you can otherwise order anything which a rule of the Senate prescribes, you must give one day's notice not merely, but the notice must specify "precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof."

> Any rule, except the eighteenth, may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate; and the rule proposed to be suspended shall precisely and distinctly be stated. The eighteenth rule shall never be suspended under any circumstances whatever.

I think the Senator from Ohio will hardly say that this rule has been at all complied with; manifestly I submit it has not. Therefore, if it be proposed that in the absence of Senators whose presence would change the complexion of the Senate we are to proceed to constitute committees, then it must be in that slow and I admit inconvenient manner pointed out by the rule; or else it must be by unanimous consent; or, in the mode prescribed in Rule 61, the rule itself must be suspended or modified.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have only to observe in relation to the argument made by the Senator from New York that in the view I entertain there is no suspension of a standing rule. It is only a different order provided for by the rule itself; and that is complied with by the fact that the resolution lay over for one day in accordance with another rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule providing for the appointment of chairmen of committees and of the members of the committees by ballot unless otherwise ordered, the Chair is of the opinion that such order must be taken by the Senate first and separately before the resolution of the Senator from Ohio is in order; that it must be ordered by the Senate first that the appointment be made in some other way than by ballot; and then the resolution of the Senator from Ohio will be in order if the Senate, and after the Senate, has so ordered. The Chair does not understand that the Senate has now so ordered.

Mr. FERRY. Then on the part of the Senator from Ohio, or some other Senator, a resolution is required to otherwise order the election of the committees of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PENDLETON. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not feel very equal to discussing this matter, but inasmuch as I believe the Chair has decided the question correctly, and as the Senator from Ohio has appealed, I think it right to state the grounds on which I shall vote that the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate. The forty-sixth rule is that—

> In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint.

The forty-sixth rule, therefore, is regulating a proceeding, not the accomplishment of a proceeding, but a process. That process shall be by ballot unless the Senate direct that it shall be done in some other way. Now, in what way does my friend from Ohio think that the Senate has directed that it shall be done in some other way? He does not think that the Senate has directed anything of the kind, for the Senate has taken no vote upon the subject. He proposes to put it, from his point of view, that the Senate shall direct that it be in another way by proceeding to do the very thing the proceeding about which is to be regulated by another and different order of the Senate, if it is not to be by ballot; so that the argument is that the rule forbids the appointment of standing committees of the Senate by resolution unless the Senate shall have made a different provision for proceeding to the election, in the very language of the rule. Now the Senator says, do not mind that; proceed to the election, and do it, and when you have accomplished your election and not before, you then by inference will have decided that you will not do it by ballot. Mr. President, that will not stand. That, I submit with great deference, is neither law nor logic.

Then when we turn to the other rule which bears upon the subject, the thirty-third, we find that all resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration. This resolution has lain over; but what is it? It is not a resolution that so much of the forty-sixth rule as requires an election by ballot be dispensed with for this occasion, but it is this and nothing more:

That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session.

It acts upon the committee and not upon the process, or mode, or way of selecting it. It makes a direction. It is the edict and order of the Senate upon the thing itself and not upon the means of accomplishing that thing. To be sure, when you have accomplished the thing you can say then we have agreed to the means by which we have accomplished it, after having accomplished it, because otherwise it would not be legal; but you can make that argument to every case in which you violate the rules.

Therefore, with great deference I submit that the ruling of the Chair is clearly right. If my honorable friend from Ohio had intended to dispense with this ballot rule he should have preceded his resolution by another, something in this way:

Resolved, That so much of the forty-sixth rule of the Senate as requires the election of standing committees to be by ballot be dispensed with for this occasion.
Resolved further, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate for the present session.

Then having adopted your first resolution you are lawfully authorized to proceed to vote upon the second.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I will agree if the sixty-first rule is violated by the present proposed action of the Senator from Ohio, to follow the suggestions made by the Senators from New York and Vermont. Rule 61 provides that:

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Is this motion now by the resolution to appoint standing committees of the Senate for the present session otherwise than by ballot an infraction of that rule? In other words, do we suspend that rule, do we modify it, or amend it, or do we act directly under its authority and provisions? That is the question. I assume that where Rule 46 provides for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate in a certain way unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, there is a plain, manifest signification of authority in the Senate to make that order in the usual way, and how is that done? By a vote of the majority of the Senate on one day's notice having been given. Was that notice given? The record answers it. Yesterday the resolution was offered, read, and ordered to be printed for the information of the Senate providing otherwise, in direct accordance with Rule 46, that we were to execute the authority therein contained to appoint the standing committees of the Senate. How? In accordance with Rule 46, and how is that? By ballot, unless the Senate shall otherwise order.

So, then, there is not only no modification, suspension, or amendment of Rule 61, but there is the simple and manifest execution of Rule 46. It is just as lawful for us upon one day's notice, which has been given, to proceed to appoint standing committees by resolution as it is for us to vote for them by ballot.

Will it be denied that if the proposition were now before the Senate to elect committees by ballot and that that had been the resolution of yesterday, it would be in order? Will any gentleman say that? Then, if it is in order for us to proceed by ballot upon giving notice one day by resolution, it is in order for us to appoint the committees otherwise by resolution. If, therefore, I say to the Senate, there was under Rule 46 the authority to appoint these committees to-day by ballot, a resolution to ballot having been offered yesterday, there is the power to do it otherwise, and that is by the resolution submitted to the Senate and now before it.

I submit with due respect to the Chair, desiring that we should hold these rules in the most strict observance, that the provision of Rule 46 allowing the appointment to be otherwise than by ballot and the Senate now being called upon to decide whether it will otherwise appoint the committees than by ballot, it is just as lawful and proper for us to appoint them otherwise as it would be by ballot if notice had been yesterday that ballot would be the method of choice.

I did not fully understand the decision of the Chair or how far my friend from Ohio appealed. I ask respectfully, therefore, that the Chair will restate his decision in order that, an appeal being taken, we may know how to vote. It seems to me clear that this is not an infraction of Rule 61; that there is neither suspension, modification, nor amendment of Rule 46; that this is the simplest authorized action under Rule 46, that committees can be appointed by ballot or otherwise, as the voice of the Senate shall indicate.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the forty-sixth rule and the sixty-first rule should be read together and construed as far as possible, so that both may stand. I do not see myself after close reading of them that there is any difficulty in this question.

At the last session of Congress, toward the latter part of it, we passed a resolution at the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that on and after the 17th of February the Senate should daily take a recess and meet again at half past seven for a certain purpose, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate. If the construction placed on this proposition is correct, as claimed by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York, before the Senate could have adjourned over and passed a night some one would have had to give notice in writing specifying that that rule in so many words and so many letters was proposed to be changed, and that he would make the motion the next day. But no such construction was ever put upon that rule or could have been put upon it.

When you say in a rule "unless otherwise ordered," that, by all the parliamentary proceedings that I can call to my mind, means to dispense to that extent with the notice required in Rule 61 and get rid of that rule; and you cannot make, according to the English language, anything else out of it. You will notice that there are few rules in the Manual that have that phraseology. The question now is, Why was that phraseology put into this rule? For the obvious purpose and reason that the Senate might at any time that suited its convenience dispense with the one day's notice in writing required to be specific under Rule 61, as specific as an indictment is required to be under the law of any State to convict a person of a crime of which he is accused. So when this resolution comes in and says resolved that the committees are so and so, that of its own vigor is the "otherwise ordered" under Rule 46, avoiding necessarily the notice contemplated in Rule 61 which would apply if these words "unless otherwise ordered" were not in Rule 46.

The sole and only purpose of putting in these words was to hold the matter within the convenience and within the control of the Senate as it sees proper. If these words were not there, it is true we should have to give a written notice and specify that we expected to change this rule, and would claim the attention of the Senate for that purpose at a particular time, and specify particularly the point we desired to suspend. But here is the rule that leaves it in the grasp of the Senate all the time by the words "unless otherwise ordered." We propose now to order otherwise and elect these committees by resolution. I suppose the Chair in his ruling had this point in his mind, (in which he is eminently correct according to my opinion,) that the resolution standing as it does is divisible, first, there is a displacement of the vote by ballot; and next comes the election of the particular persons to fill the committees.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GARLAND. With great pleasure.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator has just stated that the Senate now proposes to elect the committees otherwise than by ballot, and therefore that resolution is submitted at the present time. Objection is made to that, and the rule requires that a resolution of that kind or any resolution shall lie over one day. Now if the Senator admits that the Senate takes order otherwise than by election, certainly the rule requires that that resolution shall go over one day.

Mr. GARLAND. It did lie over one day; it was offered yesterday.

Mr. FERRY. Let me say, then, if the Senator rests upon the resolution as printed here, it is simply a declaration that the committees be so and so. Now the Senator has from his lips just dropped the expression that the Senate declares that it will elect its committees otherwise than by ballot, to wit, by resolution. If that be the case, then under objection the rule requires that a resolution go over one day.

Mr. GARLAND. But the Senator from Michigan will bear in mind that the Senate is moved now to do that under a resolution proposed yesterday, which is twenty-four hours' notice.

Mr. FERRY. My friend fails to see, and if he will look at the resolution itself he will find, that it does not declare that the election shall be so and so by resolution, or that it shall be now, but it simply declares that the committees shall be so and so. If nothing else had been said, the regular order would have been to elect them by ballot; but now the Senator comes in and proposes, or the Senator from Ohio does, to elect committees by resolution. The resolution submitted yesterday is simply a statement that the committees shall be as printed; but when it comes to the form of election, if the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Ohio desires to do differently from the mode pointed out by the rules of the Senate they must give the proper notice which the rule requires that a resolution shall lie over one day.

Mr. GARLAND. Then it comes back to where we started. If the Senator from Michigan be correct in that proposition, he reads out the force and effect altogether of the words in the forty-sixth rule,

"unless otherwise ordered," which were put there for the express purpose I have stated.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, his proposition is that the Senate, having one day's notice, may proceed to elect its committees in any way it chooses, and that an election in another way than by ballot is ordering otherwise within the meaning of this rule. If that be true, what earthly effect has the forty-sixth rule? Here is an elaborate rule that the Senate shall proceed first to elect chairmen and then to appoint committees, when, according to him, it is in the power of the Senate, in spite of it, to proceed to elect committees in any way it chooses, or to appoint them at any time without regard to the rule. Suppose this forty-sixth rule had set forth any other of a thousand methods of electing committees; it would have been precisely the same as a constraint upon the Senate that it is now; that is, no constraint at all.

Mr. GARLAND. The question of the Senator from Massachusetts simply brings to mind in a pointed manner another proposition to which I was going to refer; and I may as well do it now.

The duty that we are now seeking to address ourselves to is a duty of high constitutional privilege, or, more properly speaking, it is a high constitutional duty; that is to proceed to the organization of the Senate to properly discharge the business for which the Executive has seen fit to call us together. The balloting process existing before the adoption of this rule, or whatever process might have existed, this rule saw proper to provide that the balloting process should be continued unless otherwise ordered. Emergencies might take place, circumstances might occur which might require a quicker organization of the Senate than would be obtained by proceeding in the tedious plan of balloting.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARLAND. I have not got through answering this; but I will put them both together, and perhaps I can get along better then.

Mr. McMILLAN. In Rule 46 it is provided that—

In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint, severally, the chairman of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

Now, what order has the Senate taken, whether to elect the committees as a whole by ballot, or has it determined to elect the chairman by ballot and the others severally by resolution? What order has the Senate taken in regard to the several provisions of this rule? because there is more than one provision in it. It is not confined to the election by ballot merely, but covers the severance of committees, separating the chairman from the choice of the rest of a committee.

Mr. GARLAND. To answer the Senator from Minnesota directly, the Senate unfortunately has taken no order——

Mr. McMILLAN. What order will they take?

Mr. GARLAND. I am now trying to persuade the Senate to take some order which will hasten matters as the propriety of the circumstances and the occasion seems to demand.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator again repeats that the Senate has taken no order and now proposes to take order, and the practice of the Senate has always been to elect by ballot unless by common consent it was done by resolution. Now the Senate proposes to take order by the Senate as to the form of election. If that be the case, it is avoiding the rule which requires an election by ballot, and asking the Senate by resolution to elect by order of the Senate. If that be the case, and the Senator is correct, as I believe he is in that respect, then certainly the rule requires that the order shall lie over one day.

Mr. GARLAND. Now, Mr. President, let me go back a little; I try to keep all these questions in mind. The order that I would have the Senate take is the order now asked for; and when Rule 46 says, "unless otherwise ordered," it did not limit itself to any specific form or to any specific language. It might have said, "by division of the Senate, to be counted by the President or by the Secretary of the Senate;" and in the midst of this shower of interrogatories put to me, I want some Senator, wise in the laws of parliamentary procedure and parliamentary usage, to tell me what is the meaning of the language here "unless otherwise ordered," and what it was put in the rule for?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator desires an answer, as he appeals to the Senate, how can you "otherwise order" except by resolution of the Senate? I repeat, the rule requires that the appointment shall be by election, by ballot. If the Senate proposes to order otherwise under the rule, it must be by resolution; and if it be by resolution (and there can be no "otherwise ordered" except by resolution) then the rule requires that that resolution shall lie over one day.

Mr. GARLAND. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GARLAND. With great pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this being a question of order we ought to get at the precedents. The construction of rules of order is fixed and settled by precedents. The last precedent that I remember is that of the appointment of committees four years ago; and I am told the same precedent has been adopted always under this rule. In that instance three different, distinct resolutions were adopted, and I think these resolutions were usually of a formal character prepared by the old Chief Clerk of the Senate, Mr. McDonald. This is the order in which it was done when I was a member of the Senate before:

On motion by Mr. SARGENT,
Ordered, That the Senate now proceed to the appointment of the standing and other committees of the Senate.

That was adopted. Second:

On motion by Mr. SARGENT,
Ordered, That so much of the forty-sixth rule of the Senate as requires the appointment of the standing and other committees to be made by ballot be suspended.

Third:

On motion by Mr. SARGENT,
Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate be constituted as follows, &c.

The trouble with my colleague is that he did not precede the motion that is now pending with the two preliminary motions that have always been adopted, as a matter of form, separately. It does seem to me, therefore, that according to the precedents the point of order made by the Senator from New York is correct, and that the precedents require that the order to suspend the rule be first made; and that is the orderly way. Under the resolution now pending, undoubtedly a ballot might be demanded under the rule. If it is the desire of the Senate to adopt this list of committees, it must be done by adopting a resolution such as I have mentioned, which can only be done, if objected to, after one day's delay. That is the precedent of four years ago, as I have read, and I presume of all similar occasions.

Mr. GARLAND. I recollect that that was done on the motion of Mr. Sargent four years ago; but I recollect also that Mr. Wallace brought in two years ago a resolution precisely similar to this for the appointment of committees. True, there was no objection raised to it; but it is perfectly clear that in each case the drafter or mover of the resolution, as in this instance, thought that when it was done it complied with the language of the forty-sixth rule, "unless otherwise ordered."

I referred just now to a resolution of the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] adopted at the last session as to a recess:

Resolved, That on and after Thursday, the 17th instant, unless otherwise ordered, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day to consider the cases on the Calendar, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall otherwise order.

According to the construction now urged, a gentleman would have had to give notice that "I will move that the Senate adjourn" twenty-four hours in advance, and specify the particular time, the particular rule, and all that, and ask to have it temporarily set aside. But that is not all. The well-known and celebrated Anthony rule, which was the only protection to the Calendar, declared—

That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar.

There is a rule that we proceeded under for nearly the entire session which so recently ended. If under that rule I desired to displace the Calendar and take up the Geneva award bill, for instance, was I required to file a notice in writing and have it read to the Senate, "that to-morrow I will move to displace the Calendar and take up the Geneva award bill, and to that extent suspend the operation of the Anthony rule?" That will not hold water; that is not according to the meaning of the English language. Now tell me the difference, if you please, between proceeding to execute any such order and a rule which says "unless otherwise ordered by the Senate," exceptional in itself and put in for the very purpose of avoiding the circumlocution and necessity of a notice of twenty-four hours in writing? Unless some Senator can draw a distinction between the practice of the Senate under rules standing here for some time and under this Rule 46, the question is settled. I am satisfied that unless those words were in the rule notice would be necessary; but those words are in the rule and they leave the matter within the grasp of the Senate whenever it sees proper, and for the reason that I stated some moments ago that it might in an emergency be important to organize the Senate quicker than a ballot would permit.

And referring now to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, this is a high constitutional duty that we are discussing—to organize the committees of the Senate that it may proceed to the work of the session in a proper manner.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment? What shall I understand him to say is a constitutional duty?

Mr. GARLAND. To organize this Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean by that to organize this Senate (borrowing his phrase) to-day?

Mr. GARLAND. No; I will come to that.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish, when the honorable Senator does come to it, that he will be kind enough to enlighten my darkness on this point: is it a high constitutional or any other sort of duty for a majority, a momentary majority, to seize a day when one chair is vacant from death and three others from the formation of a cabinet, to make an organization which on Tuesday next they will have no power to make? [Applause in galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped to order.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I could answer the Senator in a sort of political combating way, but I do not care to indulge in such things here. When I get to that branch of the subject I will answer, I think, to the Senator's satisfaction and to the satisfaction of all reasonable men.

The Senator from New York misunderstood me. I did not say it was important to organize to-day. I am discussing the mere question of whether we have the right to proceed in this way. I was proceeding to say why the words "unless otherwise ordered" were incorporated in Rule 46, because of the importance of the duty of organizing the Senate, because it might be deemed necessary to organize in some method quicker than that of ballot. So far as the rule itself is concerned, I feel that my position upon it is correct; but while that is so, and while I feel that it cannot be answered according to the precedents before me, yet I wish to say in response to the Senator from New York that I do not care particularly about this matter. While I believe the position I assume upon it is correct, I am in no hot haste about organizing this Senate.

At the close of the last session of Congress the democrats had the organization of the Senate. We were called together in the wisdom of the Executive to meet on the 4th of March. Some organization had to be effected. We upon the democratic side have proceeded to present that organization as we thought it ought to be had. We have not been unduly hasty about it, it seems to me. There was no other course for us to take. If the Senator from New York or any other Senator desires some other organization, it can be proposed by amendment, or by resolution, or under whatever rule we adopt, and I do not care for one, nor do I think my party friends care to put themselves and the other side in this important matter in the attitude of two hungry individuals scrambling at the table to see who shall sit nearest the head. We know painfully—and I for one—of the vacancies here; indeed, three of them we on this side helped to make. I do not propose to take any advantage of these vacancies. But we have proposed the organization. Let the Senator from New York respond to me as frankly now, (and he will respond frankly if he responds at all,) and state when does he suppose we can proceed with this matter, when all the voices naturally belonging to this Chamber shall be here to be heard?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator wish me to answer?

Mr. GARLAND. I do, because I want to proceed in this matter so as to take no advantage. I do not wish to present either party before this country as scrambling for these positions. If the organization belongs to the democracy, they want it; if it belongs to the republican party I, for one, want them to have it.

Mr. CONKLING. If it is in order for me to respond to my honorable friend, I am instructed by others who know in each instance that one of the absentees will be here to-morrow, two of them probably on Monday, and the last of them by either Tuesday night sometime or Wednesday morning, so that really the whole question is whether we should attempt to anticipate by four-and-twenty or eight-and-forty hours the moment when the Senate will be full. That is the question I understood the honorable Senator to ask me, and I have answered it according to the best information I have.

Mr. GARLAND. The organization as contemplated by this side of the Chamber, so to speak, is presented to the Senate and is before the country for what it is worth; and while I do not desire to make a mere political convenience of this matter, it might in some aspects of the case be a serious question as to how long we should wait upon vacancies. Other seats may become vacant on the other side and on this, and so the matter may be indefinitely postponed in that way. I am perfectly willing, and I think this side of the Chamber is, that if within any reasonable time this matter can be tested and give the power where it belongs, there is no objection to a brief delay; but it is our duty, I think, with due respect to all gentlemen who may differ with me, to present this organization as we think it should be made. I am in no haste either as an individual or a public man about it, and I wish the Senator from New York to so understand as far as that matter is concerned; and if in the spirit of peace and harmony this subject is approached, I see no difficulty in settling it at an early day and sending the power where it belongs.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me a word? Setting aside the merits of the question of organization, would it not be well for the Senator to suggest and propose that the rules be not violated and that the ordinary precedents be followed? If the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Ohio who made the motion does not propose to make this appointment by election, but under the rule now proposes to order otherwise, will not the Senator follow the rules and not antagonize them and the invariable precedents? Will he not allow the notice to go over one day?

Mr. GARLAND. I repeat—and I can say no more than that—to do the thing decently and in order, I am willing to wait any reasonable time. I am not strenuous about acting to-day particularly. It is due, I think, to the country and to the Senate, as the Senator from New York has claimed by implication that you will have the power to do this, that you of the other side should signify when you expect to have that power, for I do not want to put together a piece of cloth to-day and take it apart next Monday, or next week, or any other time. I have relieved myself of all responsibility about the matter, and have taken a proper position for myself and those friends who are with me, and I disclaim again any intention, so far as the Senator from New York attempted to make that appear before the Senate and the country, that we were clutching at power that does not belong to us. I disclaim it. The truth is as to the matter of committees that individually to me the arrangement of them is of no particular concern. I had the fortune, good or bad, in the confederate congress to be upon the committee on territories. I have been upon that committee here, and have been on that committee long enough to have got my rights in the Territories; or if I have not got them it is my fault, and therefore I am not solicitous about any more committees, and I have no more to say on this subject.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, whether these committees shall be organized to-day or next week is an exceedingly small question. Whether the committees organized to-day or next week shall have upon them a majority of democrats or republicans is, in view of the work they are now to do, unworthy of a contest in this Senate. No appointments to office will be made during this executive session which will not be made on the nomination of a republican President; and I suppose whether the committees appointed be democratic or republican will not affect the confirmation or rejection of the nominations made by the President of the United States, who happens not to be a democrat. This whole question, then, gentlemen will pardon me for saying, as to whether the committees shall be organized to-day or not is too small to discuss. Beside, if the committees were organized to-day and should go on with the proper work of this session and as organized to-day a majority of them should be democratic, and if, as the Senator from New York assumes with such very remarkable confidence, when this Senate shall be full the other side will have the majority, a fact of which I do not know, but if it be true, assuming the Senator's confidence is well founded, it will be in the power of the Senate to change its committees whenever it shall see proper to do so. So I can see no result practical in its character of organizing the Senate to-day except to enable us to go on with the work of this session at once. That is the only practical result I can see.

But, Mr. President, the question which has been raised is purely a legal one, is purely one of construction, and one which may not affect or be affected by the other question in the slightest degree. If the motion now made be in order, the gentlemen can make their proposition to postpone its execution just as well without making this point of order as with making it. The only effect of making this point of order is to work delay and to produce delay. A question of construction of one of the rules of this body is made, and to that I wish to address myself one moment; for I must confess it is a surprise to me that any two legal minds in this body should have two opinions upon this question. The real question is, and there is but one involved in this point of order, can committees be appointed by this Senate under Rule 46 as it now stands otherwise than by ballot? That is the only question. If the committees can be appointed otherwise than by ballot, then Rule 61 has nothing to do with the question, for there is no necessity to change Rule 46. If we can as the rule now stands appoint committees otherwise than by ballot, then there is no necessity to change the rule or to modify the rule or to amend the rule or to suspend the rule; and therefore Rule 61 has no application to the question, and all that has been said on the subject of that rule is wholly irrelevant.

Mr. CONKLING. Or, if the Senator will allow me, no necessity whatever to maintain the rule because the rule is the merest absurdity that ever was in the world.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will pardon me; that does not follow. He is only jumping ahead of the argument. If the Senator will allow me to go on he will see it, for I know his clear mind cannot fail to see it. If we cannot appoint committees under this rule as it now stands otherwise than by ballot, then to appoint them otherwise than by ballot does involve the necessity of a change. Then Rule 61 would come in play, and would have to be followed; that is all. So the simple question is, under Rule 46 as it now stands with its wording, can this Senate appoint committees otherwise than by ballot?

Mr. FERRY. No question of that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then there is no question in your point of order.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will allow me right there. If that be the case, when the Senate seeks to appoint otherwise than by ballot, it must be by resolution certainly, and then another rule requires that that resolution shall go over one day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But that is required under Rule 33, and not under Rule 61. Under Rule 33 all orders and resolutions must go over one day unless considered at once by unanimous consent. And because of that Rule 33 this resolution to appoint the committees did go over one day. Unanimous consent to consider it was asked yesterday and it was refused, and therefore it was not considered yesterday. The whole argument on the other side has assumed that Rule 61 is necessarily to be brought into application in this case when that is the real question in discussion.

So the whole question comes back, can we appoint committees under Rule 46, as that rule is now worded, otherwise than by ballot? If so, the point of order is worth nothing. Now, this question is clearly answered by the plain reading of the rule itself.

If Rule 46 read, "in the appointment of the standing committees the Senate shall proceed by ballot," then, of course, before you could appoint in any other method you would have to change the rule; and if you had to change the rule you would have to resort to Rule 61, and change Rule 46 in the manner prescribed by Rule 61. But Rule 46 does not read that way; Rule 46 reads this way:

In the appointment of the standing committees the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot.

Then, under Rule 46, as it now stands, the Senate can otherwise order. You need not change Rule 46 in order to appoint otherwise than by ballot. The rule already says you can appoint otherwise; the rule already says you may order otherwise. Then no change of the rule is necessary. Your power is complete under the present wording to appoint the committees otherwise than by ballot. Unless this is so, the words "unless otherwise ordered" have no meaning.

Then when do you make the order? That is the question, and that is the point raised by the Senator from Michigan in his repeated questions—when do you make the order? If you can, as the rule now stands, appoint committees otherwise than by ballot, when may you order otherwise?

The Chair has ruled that you must first pass an order that it must be done otherwise, and you must pass that order under Rule 61. Surely, there is no necessity to pass any order under Rule 61 unless a change in Rule 46 is necessary, and I have just shown that is not necessary. Where do you get the authority to-day to say that it must order beforehand? Can it not order simultaneously? Is not the appointment of committees otherwise than by ballot itself an order? Will any Senator deny that? When you pass this resolution declaring that the committees for this session shall be as named, is not that an order of the Senate? Will any Senator say it is not an order? If, then, the Senate has the power to order the appointment otherwise than by ballot, and if this appointment is itself that order, where is the rule violated?

Besides, my argument at last is nothing but the language of the rule, for Rule 46 says when you may make the order; it settles that very question, I say to the Senator from Michigan:

In the appointment of the standing committees the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot.

Order otherwise when? In the appointment, in the act of appointing your committees. The manner of appointing is fixed by the order appointing the committees. If that manner is by ballot it is authorized by Rule 46. If that manner is by resolution it is otherwise than by ballot, and is equally authorized by Rule 46.

This very resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio is a proposition to appoint the committees by resolution—otherwise than by ballot—and if this resolution be adopted it is clearly the order of the Senate. There can be no escape from this conclusion, unless you say the resolution of the Senate is not an order of the Senate.

The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] talks about the form of the resolution passed four years ago. I will not stop to discuss the construction put upon it by the honorable Senator nor does it sustain the point of order made in this case, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the order now proposed to be voted on is in totidem verbis the order adopted two years ago by the unanimous votes of the Senate. It was not then discovered to be in violation of Rule 46.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will allow me in return to remind him that if he will look at the RECORD he will see that an appeal was made for the unanimous consent of the Senate to suspend this rule and to do this thing, thus clearly implying the admission not only of him who asked but of the Senate who gave consent, that without that unanimous consent it could not be done.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I am really astonished——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me answer one at a time. I must confess my surprise at that remark of the Senator from New York, for that appeal to the Senate for unanimous consent was to adopt the order on the day on which it was offered, which, under Rule 33, applies to all resolutions in the Senate. It was not to change this Rule 46 in order to avoid Rule 61. It was under Rule 33, which requires that no rule, no order, no resolution can be passed in the Senate, except by unanimous consent, on the day on which it is offered. Yesterday this resolution was offered, and unanimous consent for its consideration at once was asked by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] then objected, and it went over, under the very rule the Senator now mentions, until to-day.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Ohio rose first.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the only question, my friend from Georgia will allow me to say, is whether the resolution to provide another mode than by ballot should first be adopted, before the general resolution naming the committees is offered. Now, I will say to him that, having looked further into the precedents, I believe there is no case in our history since the adoption of this rule where this motion of my colleague has not been preceded by a motion to suspend the rule. The Senator from Arkansas said he thought it was done differently in 1879, but I have the case here before me, and Mr. Wallace, the Senator from Pennsylvania, pursued the very course previously adopted by all other Senators. So it was in 1880; the Senator who had charge of the matter then offered the three separate resolutions I before quoted, in their consecutive order, and they were adopted separately. Thus it appears that from the beginning, from the adoption of this rule, in every case the motion that is now pending as offered by my colleague was preceded by a resolution which declared that the rule was to be suspended so as to enable the Senate to proceed to elect by motion or by general vote instead of by ballot.

I think, therefore, as this is purely a question of order, we had better follow the precedents, which are a construction of the rule by all who have preceded us since the rule was adopted.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will see in a moment, with all due deference, how utterly faulty is his argument, and—I do not mean to be offensive—as a logical argument how utterly worthless it is. Almost every law that passes a legislative body says that "all laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed;" but does any lawyer ever hold that that clause is necessary? Does not the passage of a law proprio vigore repeal those in conflict with it? And when we pass an order in the Senate, declaring solemnly by this Senate that the committees shall be appointed in this case otherwise than by ballot, is not that an order by the Senate that they shall not be appointed by ballot? Because the Senator can show innumerable acts containing the repealing clause, would he therefore conclude a repealing clause is necessary to make the repeal valid? Because the Senate has sometimes or often proceeded by a formal declaration that it proceeded otherwise than by ballot, can that make an actual proceeding otherwise than by ballot without that formal declaration void or out of order?

Who can escape that argument? The unanimous consent referred to is asked under another rule, Rule 33. As my friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] suggests to me, which everybody knows to be true, every time you introduce a bill in this body, if you want it referred on the day on which you introduce it, it can be done only by unanimous consent. If anybody objects you cannot do it. That is not under Rule 61; that does not involve the necessity of offering a resolution to change a standing rule of the Senate.

No, sir; there is no escape that under Rule 46 the Senate does in express language have the power to order the appointment of committees otherwise than by ballot, and every lawyer knows that the actual passage of a resolution appointing committees is an order making the appointment otherwise than by ballot. The power to order otherwise being clearly expressed, the method of exercising that power is with the Senate, and the form is not of substance.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I desire to call his attention. I am surprised that so gifted a lawyer as the Senator from Georgia should make no difference between the statement on the part of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] as being chairman of the committee who reports this list of committees, that these be the committees, and the further proposition of defining the mode of appointment. If the Senator will turn his attention to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio he will see that there is nothing in it indicating the mode of appointment, but it is simply declaring that these be the standing committees of the Senate, now for the first time before the Chair, upon which he has ruled. The proposition is made that, not under the rule by ballot, but otherwise under the rule, not suspending the rule—I do not take that ground—but otherwise by resolution, and the Chair has ruled that upon that proposition to appoint otherwise there must be a day's notice.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator has made no new point. The question is simply this: Is not the appointment now proposed by the senior Senator from Ohio now pending, as it stands, an appointment of committees otherwise than by ballot? And if that resolution shall be adopted, is it not adopted by the Senate? Is it not an order of the Senate, therefore, otherwise than by ballot?

Mr. FERRY. Yes; but, if the Senator will allow me, that resolution cannot be entertained upon an objection until it has laid over one day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It has gone over one day.

Mr. FERRY. That is the point the Senator assumes.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That point was made yesterday. I suppose the Senator was either not here or without meaning to be offensive he was asleep or not noticing because that very point was made yesterday. This order of the Senate, proposed by the Senator from Ohio, was offered yesterday, and it went over one day under that very rule, because of the objection to its immediate consideration made by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. FERRY. I call the attention of the Senator to the wording of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio. If the Senator will show that he is not asleep now he will read the resolution of the Senator from Ohio and thus relieve me of the imputation which he has cast.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will read it. It is very short.

Mr. FERRY. So short that you can read it while awake.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did not mean to be offensive to the good Senator by the word asleep. It was in good humor. He seemed to be oblivious of the fact that yesterday the Senator from Rhode Island did make the very point that he now makes, that the resolution must go over one day. It did go over one day under that objection.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator misapprehends the position of the Senator from Rhode Island. He objected to entertaining the resolution. That is proper. No resolution can be entertained if there is an objection.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I will read the order proposed by the Senator from Ohio. It is this:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session.

Now, my point is this: If the Senate passes that resolution, is it not an order appointing committees otherwise than by ballot? Would it not be precisely the same if, instead of saying "Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate," the Senate were to say "Ordered, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate?"

Mr. FERRY. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I will just draw the distinction. If the Senator from Ohio had offered this and added "that the committees be appointed by resolution of the Senate under the forty-sixth rule," then one day's notice would have been given to the Senate, but the resolution simply declared that these shall be the committees of the Senate, not declaring what the form of election shall be; therefore the appointment must be under the rule of the Senate, which would be under the forty-sixth rule. Then the Senate declining to appoint by election, preferring to appoint by resolution, certainly the resolution must have one day's notice.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then the resolution is itself an order, and proprio vigore inconsistent with appointment by ballot. It is an appointment otherwise than by ballot.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I prefer not to give way any further. I do not wish to be offensive to my friend, but I cannot give way to such questions further, with all due deference. I did not intend to detain the Senate half so long. I must get through.

I repeat that this resolution, when passed, will be an order by this Senate appointing the committees in the method here specified—that is, by resolution, and not by ballot. That has been offered a day in advance, has gone over a day, and is now in order.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say something more, though not on this point of order. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has taken occasion two or three times—I will not attempt to quote the distinguished Senator's language—to intimate that there is a purpose or that it looks like a movement on the part of this side of the Chamber to take what we call sometimes a snap judgment, to snatch the organization of the committees at a time when we know that there are several vacant seats on the other side of the Chamber, and when we know—I believe that was the Senator's language—that if we would only wait a few days we should not have the power to make these appointments.

Mr. President, that is very singular language to come from one so distinguished as the Senator from New York, and it implies a very unjust charge, and yet it was so pungently put that it brought down the galleries.

Sir, did not an outgoing republican President issue his proclamation ordering this Senate to convene on the 4th of March? Did he not issue that proclamation after consulting the incoming President? Did he not issue that proclamation after he knew that Providence had interposed and sadly made a vacancy on that side of the Chamber in the person of the Senator from Wisconsin? What did the outgoing and incoming republican Presidents mean by calling this Senate together at twelve o'clock meridian on the 4th of March? Did they mean for us to meet here and fold our hands until the vacancy was filled, and do nothing in the mean time?

That is not all. I presume the incoming President knew when we were called together on the 4th of March that he, in addition to the vacancy created by Providence, would create three more vacancies. Did the democratic party or the democratic Senators call this Senate together? Did the democratic party take three members from that side and put them in the Cabinet, and thereby make three vacant seats on that side of the Chamber? Are we responsible for that? Were we even consulted as to the day we should be called together, or as to what seats should be made vacant by calls to the Cabinet?

The Senator says wait, wait, wait till these chairs are filled, in his very strong language. Well, could we not with equal propriety have said to the President who called this Senate on the 4th of March, wait, wait, wait until these vacancies are filled, or if he chose to call it on the 4th of March, could we not have said wait, wait until these committees are appointed before you take three members from this body and put them in your Cabinet. If any Senators were consulted on these points they were not democratic Senators. We came promptly on the day we were called, and when the President named the Senators he desired for his advisers we most cheerfully consented that he take them without even waiting for committees.

That is not all. On the very second day of the assembling of the Senate, the day after the inauguration, the President sent us a message, a very important message, in executive session making nominations to high and important offices. Did he expect us to act on those nominations or not? Did he send in those nominations on the 5th of the month intending that if we could not act upon them in the ordinary and proper way through committees we should be charged with trying to snatch the organization of the Senate? If he wanted his nominations not acted on until the vacancies were filled, why did he not forbear to send them in? We cannot act upon them until he sends them. That is sure.

That is not all. On Monday, on Tuesday, on Wednesday, on every day this Senate has been in session, the President of the United States has been sending nominations to this body. Nominations of an important character are pending here now.

Mr. CONKLING. Would it interrupt the Senator if I were to ask him to give way to me for a moment to call his attention to a statement of his own which I thought then, and I know now, was very erroneous?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator was kind enough to express his amazement—I believe that was the word—that the Senator from New York should suppose that when the organ of the democratic majority, or more exactly speaking the chairman of the democratic caucus, rose in the Senate and appealed for unanimous consent, that unanimous consent was to suspend Rule 46. That the Senator from New York should have fallen into such a blunder as that excited the amazement of the honorable Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Suspend which rule did you say? I did not catch it.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will catch it if he will allow me and I shall detain him but a single moment. I stated that heretofore, and including the last time the appeal had been to the Senate for unanimous consent to suspend Rule 46 as I understood it; and my ignorance in so understanding it, I repeat, excited the amazement of the astute Senator from Georgia. In order that that amazement may be somewhat diminished, I now call the attention of the honorable Senator to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which in the proceedings of March 19, 1879, stand these words:

> Mr. WALLACE. I ask that unanimous consent be given to the suspending of the forty-sixth rule so far as it requires the appointment of the standing and other committees of the Senate to be by ballot.
> The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

I wonder how much amazement the honorable Senator from Georgia, one of the leaders and ornaments of his party, experienced when the chairman of the democratic caucus then, the charioteer of the democrats of this body, rose and pointed out the forty-sixth rule by name and number and demanded the unanimous consent of the Senate that it might be suspended in that it required the election of committees by ballot. When that Senator, thus authorized, thus speaking for the whole body of the democrats, rose here and, according to the Senator from Georgia now, so stultified himself, so associates, where did the constitutional sword of the distinguished Senator from Georgia sleep? Was he dozing as he thought a moment ago one of the Senators from Michigan might have been, or was it a case of presence of body but absence of mind? Now I rather think the honorable Senator from Georgia will withdraw that somewhat effusive expression of amazement at the stupidity of a Senator coming only from New York, one of the unillumined sections of this Union. I hope he will withdraw his effusive statement of surprise that one coming even from a region so little enlightened as that should have fallen into the error of supposing that the thing took place which there stands stereotyped in the RECORD. It took place, the distinguished Senator from Georgia being an accessory both before and after the fact and principal in the second degree. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to the violations of order in the galleries. It is against the rules of the Senate to have applause in the galleries, and I hope it will not be continued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that order is preserved in the galleries.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, did anybody in this vast assemblage, even in the galleries, suppose for one moment that I was so thoughtless as to charge the distinguished Senator from New York with ignorance or stupidity? Can it be possible that anybody but the Senator himself thought that? Does anybody suppose that the Senator did himself think so? Why, sir, I may be guilty of a great many thoughtless things; I may have been guilty of a good-humored thoughtlessness in dealing with my friend from Michigan over the way when I said in relation to what occurred that he either did not know it or might have been asleep or not noticing. I did not know that that was going to be taken up by the distinguished Senator from New York as though I would imply that he slept too. No, Mr. President; I may be guilty of a great many thoughtless things; I may be guilty of saying good-humoredly that my friend from Michigan might possibly sleep—and we have in good old classical history that Homer himself nodded—but I would never be so thoughtless as to suppose that the brilliant Senator from New York ever nods day or night. The sun may be dimmed somewhat by dark spots, but the Senator from New York is brilliant perfectly and always. [Mr. CONKLING nodded assent.] I am glad that the Senator approves one thing I have said.

Mr. CONKLING. I always approve the Senator when he is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then I am sure the Senator will withdraw his point of order before I am done, for I am certain I am right now.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, the Senator will allow me to say that there is no knowing that I shall be here when the Senator is through.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah, well, if the Senator leaves me it will not be for the purpose of taking a nap. Never, no, never!

Now, Mr. President, I made no such comment as the Senator has stated and none to justify the interruption which the Senator has made. I spoke of what occurred yesterday as actuating the Senator from Ohio in offering the resolution which he offered yesterday, and that when he submitted it he asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration and objection being made it had to lie over one day, not under Rule 61 nor for the purpose of suspending Rule 46, but under Rule 33, as the Senator showed in his remarks, made at the time. The Senator from Ohio yesterday in offering the resolution said:

I offer a resolution, and I will state frankly that it is a resolution for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate. I am very well aware that it cannot be considered to-day except by unanimous consent.

That he did in pursuance of Rule 33, which is in this language:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

By the way, Mr. President, there is an argument suggested by that very language. Here is the rule:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Must you before the Senate can otherwise direct give notice for a day under Rule 61? Cannot the Senate that very day otherwise direct? And yet if the point of order be good that you cannot appoint committees otherwise than by ballot without first amending Rule 46 as provided by Rule 61, then the Senate cannot otherwise direct and by unanimous consent consider a resolution on the day it is offered, unless notice is given a day in advance that that rule will be amended as provided in Rule 61. But I will pass on. I had passed from this point before the interruption by the Senator from New York, and was in the midst of another branch of the debate.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me a word there, as he has addressed himself to other Senators, for if we keep silent it is an admission of the position the Senator takes. How can the Senate otherwise direct except by resolution? And the Senator in his own remarks states that no resolution can be submitted to the Senate if objection is made, unless it goes over to the next day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Here is the resolution:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session.

Here is the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. I am talking to the point the Senator made. If the resolution says "otherwise direct," how can that order be made? The Senator says, unless it lies over. I state that it cannot, if objection is made to it, for every resolution of the Senate must be by order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will excuse me; I was arguing to show the fallacy of his position. If his position be correct, that wherever the Senate must do a thing in a certain way unless it otherwise orders, it cannot otherwise order without changing that rule according to Rule 61, then you cannot "otherwise direct" under Rule 33 without first changing it by Rule 61. That is my point. My point is to show you that your point of order is not good, that it is not necessary to change Rule 33 according to Rule 61, and therefore it is not necessary to change Rule 46 by Rule 61, in order to enable the Senate to "direct otherwise" under Rule 33, or to "order otherwise" under Rule 46.

The Senator from New York interrupted me to read what Mr. Wallace said two years ago, which certainly has nothing to do with this question. I have great respect for whatever Mr. Wallace might have said at any time. The question now made was never before made, I believe, since Rule 46 has existed. Perhaps there was never before a necessity for making it. When I was interrupted, I was saying that the Senator from New York had been taunting this side of the Chamber with trying to get the organization of the committees now while certain seats were vacant; and I was answering that. A republican President called us together on the 4th of March; a republican President sent messages here for action on the 5th of March, he sent them on the 7th of March, on the 8th of March, on the 9th of March, and he has sent messages here every day we have been in session, and I expect there is one now lying on your table sent to-day. Did not the able and excellent President of the United States know, with all his familiarity with congressional proceedings, that those messages had to be referred to committees? Are there not nominations on your table, sir, that, by every precedent and every rule of propriety, cannot be acted on until committees are appointed? If the President did not expect us to appoint committees and act upon his nominations, pray why did he send those nominations in? Why does he continue to send them in? Why does he send them in every day? And because we on this side of the Chamber are going forward in the regular and orderly way of acting upon a republican President's nominations by the appointment of committees, are we to be taunted to the amusement of the galleries with a charge that we want to be organizing committees now in hot haste because certain seats are empty? Whose seats are empty? Providence emptied one; a republican President emptied three. Suppose we wait until these four seats are filled, may not the republican President the next day empty some more? May he not send the distinguished Senator from New York himself to grace some foreign court?

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the honorable Senator from Georgia is he encouraging and delighting himself with any such hope as that? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, no; no, sir; no. I would be glad to furnish foreign courts with a distinguished example of ability, grace, and courtesy combined in the person of the distinguished Senator from New York, but I would dislike very much to be deprived of the brilliant presence of that Senator in this body. Still I will say this——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator is really in earnest in that good will toward foreign courts, I suggest that he go himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, Mr. President, I cannot consent to go for two reasons: It would not please the republican President to send me and it would please the republican Senators, especially the Senator from New York, too well to have me go. [Laughter.] So there are two difficulties in the way of my going; but if the Senator from New York will not go, are there not other Senators there who might be willing to go? Who knows but that before the sun is down the President may vacate some more seats on that side of the Chamber, and if he should do so, must we wait two weeks longer, must we all sit here with our fingers in our mouths refusing to act upon a republican President's nominations until that republican President shall give us notice that he will vacate no more seats on the republican side of the Chamber, and that now we may go on? Can it be possible that the country is to be tickled with this farce? Suppose we did not go on, with the President sending his nominations here every day, nominations for judgeships, nominations for foreign missions, and nominations for all the high offices in the Government at home and abroad—he sends them here daily—suppose the democratic majority of the Senate, as now organized, should refuse to act upon them and adjourn from day to day, doing nothing, what complaint would then be made! Ah, the gentlemen would raise something more than a point of order; they would all be wide awake, and say that the democratic majority of the Senate were clogging the wheels of Government and suspending the administration of the Government by refusing to act upon the nominations of the President! If we act we are charged with seeking an advantage by hot haste though we only act when and as a republican President requires. If we do not act we are charged with obstructing administration!

Sir, there is but one course for Senators on this floor to pursue; and that is to go straight forward in the discharge of the ordinary duties of this body according to customary methods and with the proper dispatch of business consistent with its efficiency. It is idle to attempt to please those who do not intend to be pleased with anything we do.

We have shown no disposition on this side to make these little partisan political points. As the President called us to meet on the 4th of March, we assumed that he wanted us to meet on that day. As he sent in nominations on the 5th, on the 7th, on the 8th, on the 9th, and every day of our session, I assume that he expects us to act on those nominations. He knows that many of those nominations cannot be wisely or properly or according to custom acted on without the investigation of committees of this body. He knows that there are now no committees. The only way, then, to go on in the proper discharge of our duties is to appoint the committees. We are not making haste to appoint committees that will last a year; we are appointing committees that will last only as long as a majority of the Senate shall order. We are appointing committees that can perform no function except to pass upon the nominations of a republican President. We are anxious to throw no obstruction in the way of the republican President. We trust, and some of us desire to believe, that his inauguration is the inauguration of a better day; that it is the inauguration of a gentleman whose administration we sincerely trust will command the confidence of every portion of this country—North, South, East, and West.

We hope we have an administration that shall be an administration for the whole country, and for every man in our whole country. That it may be so, as he called us together and sends in his nominations we propose to act on them. We have already been delayed longer than usual. The delay in acting on his nominations shall not come from this side of the Chamber. If gentlemen on the other side choose to obstruct business as they are now doing they ought not to taunt us unjustly, untruly, unfairly, ungenerously, with being actuated with any partisan motive in this case because they are moved by such motives. They know that if we did not act we should subject ourselves to a graver charge than this one, because evils might ensue which could not be corrected if we did not act, whereas by going forward and acting upon these nominations now whatever evils may exist in the constitution of the committees can be cured any day even in the present session of this body. If action on nominations is delayed, the country shall see who is responsible for that delay and the petty motive that produces the delay.

All I have to say is that we propose to go straight along as Senators have usually gone, appoint the committees, and let them act upon the nominations. No democrat is going to get office by it. That is sure. The idea that anybody could think that there is any advantage in getting a majority of a committee for a few days, as I said before, is too small for notice. Such a charge is not fit to be made or answered.

I simply rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon the construction of Rule 46. If I have detained the Senate too long, I hope it will be charged upon the gentlemen who have interrupted me with so many questions.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, all discussion under the pending question is entirely out of order. ["No!" "No!"] I hope the Senate will indulge me for a moment while I call attention to one or two things which appear to have been overlooked in the discussion. In the first place I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the exceptional character of Rule 46. There cannot be found another rule in the whole list of the standing rules of the Senate that is so exceptional in its wording. There cannot be found another rule in which the statement is made that we shall proceed in a certain form unless otherwise ordered, save, perhaps, one rule, with which the Senator from New York is very conversant. I call his attention now to the so-called Anthony rule; precisely the same phraseology is used in the Anthony rule, which was also one of the standing rules of the Senate so long as the session lasted, that is found in Rule 46.

Mr. CONKLING. It never was a standing rule.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why was it not a standing rule of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. Simply because it was not.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was a rule of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. It was an order of the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. Well, let it be an order of the Senate. I accept the Senator's phraseology. It was an order of the Senate, and a continuing order of the Senate, with all the potency, with all the force of any rule of the Senate, and so considered. Now, what was the ruling of the Chair at that time, what was the ruling of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] who many times occupied the chair when the question came up on the Anthony rule, as to whether it was necessary to give one day's notice before moving to proceed to the consideration of a subject? The ruling of the Chair was in every case that it was not necessary so to do. The long and unbroken practice of the Senate has been simply to conform to the course proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio. The Anthony rule many times was sought to be enforced; it was sought to be enforced on two or three occasions by myself, when I objected to the consideration of a particular measure and demanded that we proceed with the Calendar. The Chair in every case ruled that a vote of the Senate could proceed to consider the case proposed by some other Senator.

As I say, it has been the long and unbroken practice of the Senate, and until to-day I have never in four years of service here known of a ruling of this character. I have never known heretofore that we could not proceed under an express rule, to wit, Rule 46, when there was a provision in the rule providing explicitly that the Senate might otherwise order. I have never yet known that it had not been the course of the Senate to proceed under the rule.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be until Monday at twelve o'clock. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn, and the question recurs on the appeal taken by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Nothing can be of more importance, at least in this body, than a right understanding of those rules which regulate its public proceedings. Above everything else, uniformity of decision is important. I wish to state in a few brief words the reasons why I dissent from the judgment of the Chair, which I do with very great reluctance. The forty-sixth rule, which has been so greatly commented upon, is in the following words:

> In the appointment of the standing committees the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint, severally, the chairman of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

It is contended, with some show of reason, that Rule 61 must be complied with in order to elect members of committees in accordance with Rule 46. Rule 61 reads as follows:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Mr. President, this is simply a question of construction of two rules which were framed for two different and distinct objects. In construing Rule 46 it must be observed that it was the purpose of its framers to give to the body, as was so well argued by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] the right to elect chairmen of committees in a way otherwise than by ballot, and that there was no sense in incorporating the language "unless otherwise ordered" into the rule if it were intended that Rule 61 should have any application whatever to the subject. Let me read Rule 46 as it would stand if the words "unless otherwise ordered" were omitted, because in considering human language and making all necessary allowance for its imperfection, we cannot say in this body that it was the intention of the men who incorporated this language into the rule that it should have no operation or effect. Let me read the rule leaving out the words "unless otherwise ordered:"

> In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate shall proceed by ballot to appoint, severally, the chairman of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

What would be necessary in order to elect in the manner now proposed if the rule stood in the way that I have read it? Nothing but a simple conformity with Rule 61. If the language "unless otherwise ordered" was omitted from Rule 46 you would have nothing to do in order to effect an election in the manner now proposed but to pursue the very course which is suggested by the distinguished Senator from New York. I ask him and those who take the view that he does, whether the language "unless otherwise ordered" is to have any effect, because in the view that I take of it, it is clear surplusage and amounts to nothing unless it is intended to do away with the very requirement which the Senator insists ought to be observed under Rule 61.

This is a simple question of construction, and I have stated in a few brief terms the reasons why I cannot support the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. FERRY. If I understand the question now pending before the Senate it is not the appointment of the committees, but the administration of the rules. Upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, which he moved yesterday, to which objection was made and which went over until to-day, we have to-day the first intimation of the manner in which the appointment is to take place.

Under the rules of the Senate (I may comprehend them all) there are but two methods of election, one by ballot, the other by resolution; and I repeat, until to-day the Senate was not aware of the method of appointment by which the majority proposed to install the committees of the Senate. When the Senator from Ohio disclosed that the method was to be by resolution, an objection was made to it under the rule requiring a resolution to go over until the next day, and the Chair, in my judgment, properly ruled that it should go over. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, and I understand that the question now pending is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

I am very clear, and my object in calling the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the language of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio was to show to the Senate that in that report no expression was made as to the method of election or appointment. The Chair was not apprised of that; no Senator beyond the Senator's own moving was apprised of the method of appointment.

I do not deem it necessary, as some Senators even on this side of the Chamber have expressed, that Rule 46 should be suspended. The rule itself covers the whole ground. It provides itself the method of appointment by election or, if by the order of the Senate, otherwise; but if not by election, that order must be by the rules of the Senate. If the Senator from Ohio had moved the election by ballot, it would have been in order under Rule 46; no exception could have been taken, no interruption, no delay; but when the Senator proposed by resolution under the clause that an appointment might be otherwise than by election, he subjected himself to the one day's delay.

I am here simply contending for the correct administration of the rules of the Senate, and I believe that to be the only question now pending. When the merits of the election of the committees shall come up, that will be another question; but I feel it to be my duty, and I believe it is the duty of every Senator, to affirm and stand by the proper rulings of the Chair. There can be no order, there can be no efficiency, there can be no proper administration of the rules of the Senate, unless on a question so clear to my judgment as this is the Chair should be sustained, the question being upon an appeal from his decision. I draw the distinction, which must be clear, between a resolution to appoint and the question of the method of appointment. When the Senator from Ohio, after his resolution having been properly introduced to the Senate, proposes a method of appointment under a clause of Rule 46, he subjects himself to one day's delay. By words I cannot add to the clearness of the case, and I believe the Senate will sustain the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. While the doors were closed, Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his appeal from the decision of the Chair; and Mr. CONKLING, by unanimous consent, withdrew the point of order submitted by him this morning; and the resolution submitted by Mr. PENDLETON was considered to be the pending business.

When the doors were reopened, after having been closed one hour and thirty-four minutes, the Senate (at four o'clock and three minutes p. m.) adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, March 14, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented the credentials of James W. McDill, appointed by the governor of the State of Iowa a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the resignation of Samuel J. Kirkwood.

The credentials were read.

Mr. SAWYER presented the credentials of Angus Cameron, elected by the Legislature of Wisconsin a Senator from that State, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Matt. H. Carpenter, for the term ending March 3, 1885.

The credentials were read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senators-elect will advance to the chair of the Vice-President, and the oaths of office will be administered to them.

Mr. McDILL and Mr. CAMERON advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted respectively by Mr. ALLISON and Mr. SAWYER, and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 1, 1862, having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call up the resolution offered by me on Thursday last and upon which we adjourned on Friday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio calls up the resolution which was the unfinished business at the last session of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution submitted by Mr. PENDLETON on the 10th instant forming the standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think it is hardly necessary to read the whole of the resolution. It has been read repeatedly in the hearing of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the reading of the remainder of the resolution will be omitted.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the course of the debate on Friday induces me to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments this morning.

It was stated with a great show of confidence and with a very evident satisfaction that when the vacant chairs on the other side of the Chamber should be filled, the republican party would have a majority in this Hall; and there was more than an intimation that the democratic party was proceeding with unseemly haste to take advantage of the accidental and temporary absence of gentlemen of that majority to seize the political power and the pleasant places of the organization of the Senate, when a delay of three or four days would prevent their doing it at all. I do not know, and therefore I do not controvert the assertion of fact, but I do know, and therefore I repel the imputation. The remarks made by the distinguished and honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on Friday show that it is utterly impossible in the present condition of parties that the republicans should have a majority of the duly-elected members of this Senate. They show further that it would be in the power of the democrats, if they choose to enter upon the ways of abstention from voting and of obstruction to which they have been invited by the occurrences of the last few days, to prevent any discharge of the public business at all.

I do not know whether or not an effective working majority under the Constitution and laws will be given to that side of the Chamber when the vacancies are filled; I have no means of knowing. I do not know what arrangements or proffers or suggestions have been made or accepted; but those omnipresent and omniscient gentlemen of the press have whispered about the Capitol, and have put it in their newspapers, that there have been unusual and extraordinary visits to the other end of the Avenue, and they have connected oddly the name of a distinguished Senator who sits near me (certainly it was out of the exuberance of their imagination, for there could be no foundation in fact for it) with the dispensation of Federal patronage and the organization of the Senate. It has been whispered by them in and out of their papers that there have been conferences in the Capitol in which champagne and satisfaction were equally enjoyed, and that, too, has been connected with the statement as to the organization of the Senate. As I said, I do not know what truth there can be in these suggestions, but they have filled the air for the last few days.

I say that the imputation which was made upon the democratic members of the Senate is without foundation in fact; it is without justification; and it is without palliation in any single act of any single member of that party during this session of the Senate. It is a wrong to us at whom it was leveled, and it is a greater wrong on the part of gentlemen who have so unwarrantably made it.

If it be true that within the next three or four days the gentlemen who sit on the other side of the Chamber will have a majority and be charged with the responsibility of the due transaction of the business of the country, then it is a still greater wrong, for if they stand and know they stand in that responsible attitude to the country it was their duty, I humbly submit, to seek conference and consultation and co-operation and harmony of action instead of repelling as they have done our overtures for all.

I say that this attempt to organize the Senate is an honest attempt to do a great public duty, a duty enjoined by the Constitution, enjoined by the rules, enjoined by a patriotic desire to execute speedily and properly and intelligently that business for which a President elected by the republican party has chosen to convene us and which he commits every day to our consideration. It is an effort to discharge a public duty, the failure to do which would have properly subjected us to the merited criticism of the country and to its merciless scourging for a willingness to paralyze or permit to be paralyzed one great body in the State by reason of our imbecility or something worse.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, make treaties, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint public officers. "Advice and consent;" these words imply more than inaction, more than quietly registering the opinion and formulating into decisions the actions of the Secretary of State in making treaties or the action of the President in making nominations. They imply an intelligent, conscientious discharge of the duty of investigation and examination as to the honesty, integrity and capacity for the particular place which will enable us not only to give our consent but actively to give our advice and participation in the duties thus confided to us.

In the early history of this Government the Senate contented itself with special committees appointed to take charge of a special bill or to examine into a special nomination; but as early as 1816 the system of standing committees was adopted by the Senate, and since then it has been uniformly followed. Since then it has become so interwoven with the transaction of all the business of the Senate that, as every Senator here knows, the committees of the Senate are the only machinery by which the Senate investigates either questions of law or questions of fact. Every Senator upon this floor knows with what speed, when a doubtful question comes up, it is inquired whether it has been examined by a committee, and a call is made for its report. Every Senator knows what great weight the conclusion of any standing or select committee of the Senate exercises upon the mind and the judgment of members save only in merely partisan questions. Every Senator knows that the working machinery of this body depends upon the formation and intelligent action of the committees.

So much has this become the common law of this body that our rules provide that without objection bills may be read twice on the same day in order that they may be referred. When we come to the executive sessions of the Senate rules are provided (and these are the public rules published and known to the world, and therefore I violate none of the secrecies of the Senate by appealing to them) by which when a treaty is sent here for consideration the only motion that is in order is to refer it to a committee, and it cannot fairly be considered by the body until the committees are formed and the appropriate committee reports it to the Senate for its intelligent action. When nominations are made our rules provide that they shall go of course to the proper committees of the Senate, and that after a report is made they shall lie over one day for consideration. I hazard nothing in stating in this presence that the working machinery of this body is so incomplete without the formation of committees that no action satisfactory to the Senate except that which can be done by unanimous consent is ever taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator, if I correctly understand him, has just stated that the rules of the Senate made a blockade of executive business, for instance, without the formation of committees, and that the rules forbid our doing anything with a treaty until it should be referred. I do not so read them. The sixty-ninth rule provides that—

> When a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification, it shall be read a first time; and no motion in respect to it shall be in order, except to refer it to a committee or to print it, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

That is on its first reading. It is therefore, I submit with great confidence, both upon this rule and upon practice, if I may speak of that, perfectly within the competence of the Senate not to refer a treaty, but to print it in confidence on the first reading, consider it as in Committee of the Whole, exactly as it is with every bill, with every nomination, with every other thing which the Senate has to do.

Mr. PENDLETON. It was upon the authority of that rule, Mr. President, that I made the statement I did.

[At this point a message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I was saying, and I repeat it, that the rules have been so formed, the proceedings of the Senate have been so adjusted to a reference to the standing or select committees of the Senate that except that business which can be done by unanimous consent none is done to the satisfaction of the Senate except through the agency of committees.

From the very beginning of the adoption of this system these committees have been formed. I have before me the history of the committees of this body. Since the year 1833 there has not been a single executive session of the Senate called upon the incoming of a new Administration in which the standing committees have not been formed, and never have we reached the 14th day of the month of March that the Senate committees were not all in working order. A Senator suggests that I should read the paper. It would take too long. Never have we gone beyond the 12th day of March without the Senate being put in its proper working trim by the appointment of committees.

As is well known to the country, certainly to the Senate, the adjournment of the last Congress found us with more than a hundred nominations on our table. It found us with treaties upon our table. Daily since we have been in session the President of the United States has sent us nominations for the judiciary, which require the intervention of the Judiciary Committee; nominations for the Army, which require the examination of the Military Committee; nominations for the Navy, which require the intervention of the Naval Committee; nominations innumerable almost for the Post-Office, which require the intervention of the Post-Office Committee; and here we are upon the tenth day of the session and not one particle of business has been done except that by unanimous consent, and that unanimous consent has been usually asked by our brothers on the other side of the Chamber.

This is the condition in which we found ourselves placed. Three courses were open to us: to organize the Senate and put it in working order; to cease attention to public business; or to abdicate the duty of performing it intelligently and upon investigation. I submit that if our friends upon the other side of the Chamber knew that they were in a majority it was their duty to seek consultation, to seek co-operation, to make suggestions in order to do this duty properly. They neither took the initiative nor sought co-operation. They made no suggestion; they seemed to be perfectly willing to sit inactively and silently by and see this paralysis of the powers of the Senate. It then became the obvious, the manifest duty of those in the temporary majority, if it were temporary, in the Senate to endeavor to put it in a condition to do the public business with which we were charged. There was no escape for it. We would have received, as I said before, a merited criticism and a merciless scourging if we had silently sat here and permitted the condition of affairs I have stated to be continued. We have had the responsible majority here; we have to-day the responsible majority in this Chamber. When it may terminate I do not know; but as long as it does exist, even if it be for an hour, it is the bounden duty of the majority to move forward in the straight line of intelligently executing the public duty committed to it. So we determined to go forward, and so we have gone forward, and to-day we stand again before the country and the Senate begging the Senate to organize itself in order that the business of the country may be conscientiously and properly discharged.

Since I have been speaking there has come from the President of the United States a message which, if all the signs do not fail, is again committing to us the nominations of persons to offices which the President thinks essential to carry on the Government.

I have been told that in the early years, those at least which for a good while have passed by, the Senate was accustomed to exercise an iron rule in the formation of its committees; that the majority designated throughout the membership of the committees; but in these later days a gentler, a better, and a more courteous rule has sprung up, until it is now the accepted custom for the majority of the Senate, or those who suppose they are the majority of the Senate, to seek conference with the minority, to compare views with them, to discuss with them not only which Senators belonging to the minority shall be placed upon particular committees, but also to take advice and counsel with them as to the number of representatives that the minority shall have and the number of committees the entire control of which shall be confided to them.

Following this courteous and proper rule of the common law of the Senate, I was charged with the duty of inviting that conference. I did so. I went to the father of the Senate who is charged as I understand with that duty by our friends on the other side. I invited consultation; I invited a suggestion as to all these various points; and I was met with the statement that the republican party on the floor declined to take any part in the organization. Not to be thrown out of the regular course of informal communication of this kind between the two parties here, I communicated in writing our views upon the subject, and begged from him a statement of his own. I indicated the number of representatives upon the committees which it seemed to us the minority should have, and I indicated also our views as to the number of committees which should be confided to them.

I was again informed that the minority would have nothing to do with the organization of the Senate; and upon that occasion it was said that it was unfair in the absence of certain gentlemen not yet elected, Senators in prospective, to proceed with the organization. When I put the question, as I did, "When they are all here will you then be able to organize the Senate?" I was answered that there was no assurance of that fact. I was advised at the same interview that the republican party would make no suggestion as to the members whom they desired to have upon the committees; that they would designate no names; and it was put upon the majority in the Chamber to select the names of the minority to go upon the committees. Then, seeking to do entire justice, seeking to obviate every possible objection, the names were taken of those who stood upon the committees at the last session of Congress—selected by a republican caucus, voted for by all the party—and assigned to the same committees. The duty to which we confined ourselves was to fill vacancies with new members as intelligently, according to their reputation before the country and their tastes, as we could. Out of these proceedings came the resolution which I had the honor to submit forming the standing committees of the Senate.

We were met on the first day with an objection which carried it over. We were met on the second day with a point of order which consumed the whole day in its discussion, and we are now met by a proposition on the part of the republicans that if we will withhold a number of votes of Senators who are here present on this floor equal to the vacancies that exist on that side, pair our active Senators with gentlemen not yet elected, and who it is supposed will be some time or other Senators, men who are to be elected or appointed in the extremes of the country who, if they are not here now, will have to travel each a thousand or more miles before they can get here—the proposition is that if we agree to this extraordinary concession, that if we pair living, active, vigorous members against members in expectancy, members who would not to-day have any right to admission to these doors if they should present themselves, then, then this duty of organizing the Senate can be performed.

Here we are presenting ourselves to the Senate with a list of committees made up in this way, with an actual necessity for having the committees appointed, following precedent, following the extremest laws of courtesy, actively pressing to put this Senate in working order, and we are told that these powers must be paralyzed unless we of the majority will consent to forego the votes of our members for those whom it is only expected some time or other will be members, and as to whom, in the possibilities of life, in the possibilities of the circumstances by which we are every day surrounded, no man can say whether they ever will be members of the Senate.

This, then, is the course that the democratic party has pursued. This, then, is the foundation for the imputation that we are seizing with undue haste and a wrongful spirit upon the powers that the organization of the Senate gives. These considerations induced our endeavors to organize the Senate, to put it in working trim, to proceed with the business confided to us by the President under the Constitution. We are met, first by obstructions under the rules, next by points of order, and lastly by this proposition which is unparalleled in the history of Congress or any legislative body of which I ever heard.

Sir, it is not for me to say at this moment how this proposition will be received. I say that it is a most extraordinary one. I say that it is calculated to form a most dangerous precedent in our history. I say it is carrying the pairing system, already gotten to be so enormous an abuse, to the point of pairing with men who may never be elected, and may well awaken our apprehension, and may well upon the highest grounds of patriotism compel this majority as it is to-day in the Senate to pause and reflect before they agree to it. If it shall be hereafter accepted, I for one do now and here enter my solemn warning in order that it may not grow into a precedent which shall be dangerous to the State.

But I rose mainly, Mr. President, for the purpose of putting the history of the action of myself and my associates in its true light before the country, to vindicate their action, to show that it was in accordance with all the rules of this body, in accordance with the highest conceptions of public duty, that it had nothing in it of an undue desire to grasp the powers of the organization, but that it was commended to us by our patriotic desire faithfully, fairly, conscientiously to weigh the treaties that have been sent to us and the nominations which lie on our table. [Mr. PENDLETON here took his seat. After a pause he rose and said:] If nobody desires to continue the discussion, perhaps we had better take the vote.

Mr. CONKLING, (in his seat.) Or adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator thinks it would be better to adjourn?

Mr. CONKLING. I merely made that suggestion, because I supposed the Senator had knowledge of some fellow-member who was not ready to proceed. An adjournment would enable him not to be as elaborate, perhaps, as my honorable friend from Ohio has been, but nevertheless he delights the Senate and the galleries.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk commenced to read the resolution with the list of standing committees as proposed by Mr. PENDLETON on the 10th instant.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the reading of the resolution only was called for and not the list of committees.

Mr. PLUMB. I called for the reading of the whole resolution. The committees are a part of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do you want the names?

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust that we shall not be pressed to a vote on this question immediately, and I submit to our friends on the other side that we go into executive session and see what is on the table. Therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope not, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the motion will be withdrawn, as I believe it is not debatable.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withdraw it with pleasure if the Senator from Delaware desires to be heard.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate with all respect my views of our duty at the present time, quite irrespective of our party associations. I do not propose in what I have now to say to lay down a rule for a republican minority, if minority it be, that I should not lay down for a minority of the party with whom I act. Let us consider for a moment where we stand and what are our duties in respect of the existing condition of affairs.

It must not be forgotten that underlying all councils whether those convened under a republican form of government or no—under all councils there is an ultimate power, and that power is the voice of the majority. It is the lex majoris partis, and this I say is not confined to legislative assemblies under a republican system of government, but it is a law of all councils and all assemblies where it is not otherwise expressly provided.

On the morning of the 4th of March in this Chamber assembled a Senate. There was a majority of about nine votes on this, the democratic side of the Chamber. For two years that majority had arranged the committees of this body and conducted the business, and there stands the record of how it performed its duty. By twelve o'clock meridian on that day under the action of the outgoing Executive, a republican President, the new Senate, or to speak more accurately the Senate of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, was convened. By no consultation with the majority, upon no request or representation of the democratic members of this body, but with the supposed advice and consent of the incoming republican Executive, the Senate was brought again into session. It was, I say, with his approval that we were here brought; and what has happened since? He has performed the functions of his office by sending to us nominations of a Cabinet of his constitutional advisers, and we, believing still that the responsibility and duty rested upon us as a numerical majority, have acted in the due spirit of comity that should distinguish the co-ordinate branches of this Government, promptly and without hesitation have given to the Executive who was not of our choice the Cabinet selected by himself. Unanimously it has been said to him "As upon you rests the responsibility for the execution of the laws of this land, we shall couple with it the power to carry out that responsibility." So far we have moved along in accordance with rule, with order, with precedent, with the spirit that should control the performance of high public duty by American representatives.

What else has occurred? The President of the United States, by his independent action, and not ours, has created three vacancies in his own party ranks in this Chamber. He has taken three of our distinguished associates and placed them in his Cabinet council. Death has stricken from the ranks of our associates another able and distinguished man, the one as the other entirely beyond the reach or the control of those who were in the majority in this Chamber on the 4th of March, and who if they be in the majority to-day cannot disrobe themselves of their responsibilities and stand before the country ciphers and not men in the performance of grave public duties.

We have, I say, therefore assumed that which we believed to be true that the majority of the last session, although diminished in numbers, was not absolutely annihilated. Senators, if we are in error in that fact, come forward and show it to us and we will readily, without demur, without irregular opposition, without filibustering, hand over to you the power that we have exercised as a party for the last two years and hold to-day. I beg you will not think so poorly of us as to suppose that we stand here seeking for the nominal power and control of this body for a few poor days, poor weeks, or months if you will. What is there that we have done or proposed to do? By the express terms of this resolution this organization of the committees is to last only during the present session. Is there a man here who does not wish that session to be as short as is consistent with our duty? You know, my associates on the other side, and you my associates on this side, how much of personal and private inconvenience, nay of distress there is that we should be kept here unexpectedly, here away from duties that call loudly for our presence elsewhere.

Now, what is there in this? What have we to gain by the control of the Senate for the next ten days or two weeks, which I trust will enable us to wind up our portion of the public duty and go to our homes? Is there money? Not one farthing. Is there power? Nothing more than simply to confirm the nominations of your Executive—at least yours in a party sense, for I hold that he is the President of the United States. What, then, is to be gained? What is the object? I profess to you that I know of none but the performance of the usual public duties attendant upon an executive session. I profess to you that I have yet to hear privately, publicly, anywhere, a suggestion on the part of any member of the party with whom I act in this Chamber that there was any other object or intent, or that any can be divined or imagined, except that we should exert our power as a majority to the extent of our responsibility and not one inch beyond it.

Mr. President, we are not here engaged in a petty scramble for the control of offices. It is an unworthy suggestion that such an idea should prevail. We have had the control of this Senate, after a certain fashion, for the last two years; and until it is changed, and changed by a vote of the Senate, we still hold it. It is not a new acquisition of power. We are simply asking you to-day, gentlemen, to decide whether or not the numerical majority is with you or with us.

But it has been suggested that individuals not members of this body and who never were chosen or sworn in and who may never be chosen or sworn in, shall yet be counted in the composition of this body. Senators, is there any precedent for such a suggestion? And is there not something rather dangerous in stretching the rules of comity of a legislative assembly and in agreeing to count those men as members who are not, who may never be, and upon whom the responsibility of action may never rest? Is there, I ask you, any precedent for this? If there be one, I have yet to hear it. If any man on that side told me that he was called hence by the illness of his family, by some supervenient trouble that he could not control, and asked me to pair with him—an arrangement which is usually allowed to enable us to conduct business on those terms of comity and courtesy which are as essential as the spirit of law itself—I would instantly assent to it. I see before me the face of many an associate who would only have to suggest to me that extreme personal inconvenience or ill-health led him to desire to make a pair with me in order that he should obtain it and obtain it instantly. But when did it ever occur, or when was it ever before suggested, that we have the right to call and count a man a member of the body who is not so in point of fact and who may never be? If it happens that the ranks in this Chamber (and it can only be on one side) may further be depleted by official nominations, there again new vacancies occur and with new vacancies new delays—pending which no business can be conducted in an orderly and proper manner for want of organized committees to whom nominations by the President can be referred.

Now, gentlemen, how long does it take to organize the committees of the Senate? It could have been done a week ago or to-day before the hand of that clock reached ten minutes past twelve. If on the day after to-morrow we should be in session or on Friday or on Saturday and these memberships which we expect to see filled were filled, I should expect a resolution in the same form mutatis mutandis, the names of republican majorities where now they are minorities upon the list of committees, presented to the Senate and that we should vote upon that as regularly and straightforwardly as I would wish to see us proceed to-day.

And it must be remembered Mr. President that this is not a change in the control of the committees as proposed, it is a continuance, a lapping over of the organization of the Senate from the former session to the present. We are not changing the organization and we are not changing the control; we are simply asking to continue it in the name and for the sole purpose of the orderly and decorous conduct of public business.

What dream of ambition, what hope, what expectancy is there to any member of the democratic party in a special session of the Senate called for executive business only at the hands of a republican Executive? Why, look at it Senators! There can be none, and therefore I say to you, if it shall be that after Tuesday or Wednesday or any other day in the future we sit in this Chamber with you equal in numbers, with a majority on your part, and the Senate organize under that majority, I propose for one to throw no obstacle in the way of your performance of your duties and responsibilities that I would ask you to remove from our way now when we are as I believe charged with the duties that attach to a numerical majority in this Chamber, and of which they are not warranted to divest themselves.

It is not a question of permanent organization and control. It is so temporary that the ebb and flow of party numbers will quickly change the balance to one side or the other, and what I desire to say for myself, and for those with whom I act, and in saying which I believe I speak for them, and to say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber—what I desire to say is, let us deal with this important public question in a spirit worthy of it. It is not just, it is not right to make the imputation of snatches and clutches at temporary power. Nothing of the kind is intended. Ever since the Senate met on the 4th of March the usual motions that signify numerical control have come from this side of the Chamber; the ordinary questions that have been submitted to the body of adjournment, of consideration of executive business, and the like, have been controlled without opposition by suggestions from this side of the Chamber. That was in accordance with the majority that has existed for the last two years, and that in my opinion does exist to-day. If to-morrow or the next day, as I say, the tide of party numbers shall carry the majority over to that side, I shall bow to it and to its orders under the rules and regulations of the Senate; but I do not think that there ought to be any hesitancy in the regular, orderly, unobstructed action of the Senate in accordance with the precedents of our body spread upon our records.

My friend from Ohio stated the historical fact which I ask Senators not to forget and I restate it upon his authority knowing that he has carefully examined the matter, that never, in the history of our Government up to the present time has the formation of committees for the purpose of transacting the business of the Senate been delayed as long as it has been at the present session. To-day is the 14th day of March. I have seen the committees organized on the 8th, the meeting being on the 5th; on the 10th, on the 11th, but never before so late as the 14th.

Therefore it is, sir, that I trust, speaking in a spirit which I hope has been appreciated of perfect fairness, of perfect candor, a spirit I think worthy of the subject with which I deal, that there may be no resort to irregularities, no resort to dilatory motions, but let us constitute the Senate committees; and when, as I say, the tide of numbers shall bear power to you, there is no man in your own party that you can call upon with more confidence to sustain you than myself to recognize the responsibility and place there the power of a majority and present to our countrymen of all parties the proof of subordination to the rules and precedents, and the meaning of the rules and precedents of this Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. ALLISON. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAYARD and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that as we cannot do anything when we get into executive session, cannot even refer a nomination made by the President, why go there?

Mr. CONKLING. How does the Senator know we cannot do anything?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Because we cannot even refer a nomination made by the President, for there is no committee to whom to refer it.

Mr. CONKLING. I remind the honorable Senator that the newspapers say we have done a good deal in executive session.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes; we have done all kinds of business; but we have given that up.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order. The motion is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who a few moments ago told me that he was too unwell to stay in the Chamber, and requested me to pair with him on all political questions. Considering this a political question, I paired with him. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and I presume he would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 35, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Hale,	Mahone,	Rollins,
Blair,	Harrison,	McDill,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—2.

Edmunds, Garland.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, an astute Frenchman said, and the world has often repeated, that he accuses who excuses. Who has cast imputation upon the honorable Senator from Ohio? Who has cast imputation on any Senator? The great master of human nature has said "thus conscience does make cowards of us all." I do not say that these words have application here; and yet the honorable Senator from Ohio who conducts this proceeding with so much ability and skill on the democratic behalf, seems, if he will allow me, to "flee when no man pursueth."

I must think, Mr. President, (and I feel sure I shall offend nobody in uttering the thought,) that it is effect beyond these galleries which democratic Senators seek. They need no vindication here; they need no exoneration from injurious charges. Surely they do not doubt or suspect each other; and we who sit on this side, knowing them and appreciating them and regarding them as we do, need not be told how far they are from questionable aims. I must believe that, either because of a feeling that some explanation or exposition of what has been done or attempted is needed, or because of a hope that some impression beneficial to their party may be made elsewhere, honorable Senators are moved to justify or modify positions which have not yet been assailed.

The honorable Senator from Ohio some days ago in order to effect a formation of the Senate's committees, proposed a resolution, as I believed then and as I believe now, in plain violation of the rules of the Senate. The resolution violated not an order of the Senate, or merely the settled practice of the Senate, but one of the standing rules of the Senate which, as the by-laws of a corporation govern the corporation, govern the Senate and provide for their own modification or suspension.

Hearing this novel resolution read, I ventured in the absence of another Senator who more appropriately and persuasively might have interposed, to suggest a point of order, and on that point and on the decision of it some debate ensued. I heard no accusation, I heard nothing said of or touching the honorable Senator from Ohio which had it been said of me would have suggested a need either of resentment or defense. I do not mean that the honorable Senator has manifested resentment, but I do mean that for some reason it has pleased him on charges on which he has never been arraigned to make an elaborate disclaimer, the seeming purpose of which was to purge the party which so ably he leads.

Without attempting to follow the honorable Senator in the realm either of historic or of high constitutional discourse, I wish to bring the matter in hand to the attention of the Senate and of all whom it may concern, and therein I include so many as may read my words of that vast multitude who will scan the speech of the honorable Senator; I ask the attention of all these to the simple matter which detains the Senate now.

Just before the expiration of the constitutional term of the last administration, with a suddenness which sharpened the grief with which all were filled, tidings came that the gifted Senator from Wisconsin who so long sat immediately behind me, and who wherever he sat was so near to all of us, had passed the dread bound which is never recrossed by returning steps—he had retreated from the din of the Senate and of the world, and the gates had forever closed behind him.

Immediately afterward, the outgoing Executive for reasons no doubt sufficient for him convened a session of the Senate to meet at the expiring moment of the preceding session. We come here. If I mistake not I have heard from two Senators that this called session at high noon on the 4th of March was the act, at least as a privy if not as an author, of the new President of the United States. Disclaiming authority to speak in that regard, I allude to it to doubt whether adequate evidence of that allegation has been so generally distributed as would appear among a portion of the members of this body. Be that as it may, the Senate assembled. Mr. Carpenter was gone; a statute of our own deferred the day when his successor could be seated. There came on the second day the nomination of three members of the Senate to become members of the Cabinet, and because confirmations are public property, unsheltered by the rules of secrecy, I have a right to say that these three nominations were promptly confirmed, those who took part in that proceeding of whatever politics knowing of course that the acceptance of the commissions which awaited them would vacate three seats.

Mr. President, for fear of a defense against other unmade charges, I pause to say that it never occurred to me that we were dealing with "gift-bearing Greeks." If the democratic members of the Senate concurred or led in the confirmation of three Senators and a vacation of three seats on the republican side, never have I supposed that the purpose was to leave us on this side naked to the adversary, suppliants either for mercy or delay. I had no idea, I wish more explicitly to affirm, that we should ever be compelled to fight for sun-down or Blucher because the generosity of our adversaries had vacated three of our seats. Indeed in the beginning there was nothing to suggest such a strait. Several days elapsed during which the constitutional sword of the Senator from Ohio was sluggard in its scabbard; for several days that honorable Senator did not feel the sides of his intent pricked by the spur of the Constitution. Day after day passed while rumor and newspapers chronicled the easy stages of that ecumenical council, that congregation of variegated infallibility commonly called a democratic caucus, sitting with leave to sit again, and weary with the fatigue of suspended judgment,—perplexed and jaded with the question how the independent party in the Senate was to be captivated, weary in continuing the enginery and allurements which were to make conquest of the distinguished Senator from Illinois and lead him captive at the wheel of the democratic chariot. Having in the language of a national democratic platform exhausted the resources of statesmanship, they at last came in with a belated report, a report fearfully and wonderfully made,—a report defective in some regards, but in others abounding in the very affluence of sagacity.

For example both the Senators from Ohio were put on one and the same committee, the Judiciary Committee, in order probably that the great State of Ohio might not only give the country the land of the law but the law of the land. [Laughter.] There were other curiosities and marvels in this report which one need not consult the signs in the zodiac to discover: indeed the performance so far resembled divine peace, that it somewhat passed understanding. This report being made, I will not say it turned out—for should I say that I should be much more amenable than I am, or than any other republican Senator is to the allegation that we have cast imputations at the honorable Senator from Ohio—I will not say it turned out, but I say that appearances suggested that although several days had been allowed quietly to elapse, although it had been held by the Senate that the Cabinet ministers, the heads of all the great Departments, not only those who had been members of the Senate but those who were never members of the Senate, might be properly confirmed and the President might decently and in order be advised; although the Senate had held in the instance of other important officers that without committees the Senate might discreetly and conclusively proceed,—after many days in which proceedings had proved the power of the Senate, without the formation of committees, to dispatch its business, appearances, I say, suggested that full organization was to be effected in the absence of four republican Senators every one of whom was constructively here, not one of whom was absent save either by a stroke of Providence or by a temporary vacation of a seat certain to be filled by a republican: I say certain, because although a Senator may die the States never die. This being—I wish to shade very nicely all these phrases, and therefore I will not say the apparent intention of the other side, but it being possible that there was danger that by accident or design we might inadvertently find ourselves going to trial on so important an issue with four of our seats temporarily vacant, and that thus the scepter of power might be handed over to you democratic Senators who sit here, it seemed to this side, certainly it seemed to me, that nothing of which the case admitted would be more lacking in utility, more scant in propriety, than for us to consent to the organization of the Senate against the constitutional majority. This seemed inadmissible, albeit as has been suggested this morning we might on Wednesday next—I am told that on Wednesday in the ordinary course of trains a Senator from distant Minnesota will be here—on Wednesday or on Thursday, a little space of time to be measured rather in hours than in days, the majority, now temporarily disabled, might, if I caught the phrase aright, by a motion in the very words of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio overturn the organization which would not then have lasted long enough for the riders to take their seats in the saddle and put their feet in the stirrups.

I say it seemed to me that such a proceeding would be not only beside the purpose but beneath the dignity of the Senate, as the Senate was before we knew it, and as I am glad to say the Senate still is, and as I wish to believe every democratic Senator intends that during his service it shall remain.

So it occurred to republican Senators that not only for reasons of good understanding, of courtesy, and good sense, it would hardly be right during the absence of Senators who had been transferred by the votes of the Senate to another forum, to take action prompt if not hasty which would annex to the occasion an awkward and injurious predicament.

It seemed to me, not only for such reasons but for reasons rising higher and spreading broader, that it would be only fair that the thus momentarily apparent majority of the Chamber should wait that little lapse of time which in the language of lawyers would put the Senate in statu quo.

The honorable Senator from Ohio was pleased to speak, calling it a most extraordinary suggestion, (I think that was his phrase,) of the proposal that if those to-day commanding the most votes in the Senate wish for convenience to utilize economically time, if they really wish to anticipate by a day or two the visible presence of these absent Senators to be, they should one of them or two of them, as the case may be, withhold their votes as the offset of these votes so soon to arrive. My honorable friend thinks the suggestion so surprising that it requires a superlative properly to describe it. In order to defend myself at this point, without trenching upon private conversations, without feeling that unpermitted I may detail at length in the Senate a long private conversation, or rather my understanding of it, I may venture to say that the suggestion of withholding a vote to correspond with a temporarily absent vote of ours did not originate on this side of the Chamber, but came from a democratic Senator now in my eye—one quite able both to judge of the proprieties of an occasion and to vindicate the judgment he forms.

Upon that suggestion the Senate stood over until this morning, and now comes the honorable Senator from Ohio with a sort of comment of which I will hazard this assertion: when that honorable Senator shall take the RECORD and read coldly some of his sayings he will be likely to reflect that the democratic party and the necessities of this occasion might have been rescued from destruction without going quite so far. If my ears did not deceive me, the Senator talked about meetings held by Senators in the Capitol at which "champagne and satisfaction" were the arguments employed. I have no knowledge, no means of suspicion, to what the honorable Senator refers; but knowing him as I do, it must be indeed a dire party necessity which so overpasses the barriers which guard personal and private intercourse. I know of no meeting either in the Capitol or at any man's dinner-table or in any other private place where either champagne or satisfaction, still less both of them, have appeared as the ministers of senatorial affairs. I trust the honorable Senator will pardon my saying that it might be due to various considerations that the Senator should not put afloat an insinuation so gross and vague and likely to be random and injurious perhaps by reason of its vagueness. It is said that mystery is one of the elements of the sublime in writing and in speech, and so mystery and an irresponsible and nebulous inexactness sometimes become one of the most virulent, one of the most vicious, and one of the most poisonous ingredients of an accusation. I incline to think the honorable Senator from Ohio on his own account may see fit to at least fix some limits or give some direction if not some qualification to such a remark.

Coming over to Monday morning we are within a few hours of that day on which every seat on this side is to be filled, that day on which once for all this question may be decided. I do not believe that the Senators I face seriously mean, after the lapse of all the days between the 4th of March and this day, for the sake of saving or under guise of saving a few remaining hours, both to refuse pairs to absent Senators and persist in an attempt to consummate a result. I do not believe that; I have no right to believe it. The mode in which the democratic members of this body have conducted this proceeding thus far gives no warrant to me to so believe. On the contrary, I feel quite easy.

The Senate having listened to the instructive and eloquent oration of the honorable Senator from Ohio, having listened to another very careful speech on the other side, and having been subjected to the discomfort of listening for a while as they have done now, when it shall be relieved and refreshed by such other observations as may fall from other Senators, should go into executive session or adjourn, unless two democratic Senators will proffer the courtesy of a vote withheld to balance a vote not here for the moment, but so soon to be here.

One Senator spoke of the organization of the Senate as if speaking of a paltry and insignificant affair. If I caught his words aright he said, "Come and show us your majority, and we will hand over the possession of power." Considering the selection of this day for that offer, it is a little suggestive. The only thing we want is an opportunity in a constitutional way to match numbers against numbers, to have the men whom the people have sent to sit on this side of the Chamber vote their judgment, at the same time that the vote is given by those who sit on the other side; but on a day when three or four of them are found absent a Senator rises and says, "Come forward and show us your majority and we will release our hold on power."

The hold on power which perhaps is to be released and perhaps is to be retained is a very important affair, and for reasons not such as those to which reference has been made. The organization of the Senate now, must, not conclusively to be sure but in large degree, determine the organization which is to remain; and therefore in practical effect and intendment the inquiry is whether all the instrumentalities of legislation and of constitutional action and policy for which committees are formed, shall be deposited with committees of democrats governed by democratic Senators. It was the saying of an old parliamentarian that a child is not to be given to a nurse who will strangle it, a mode he took of stating that legislative, administrative, political, or parliamentary measures are not to be given into the custody of those who are against them.

It therefore becomes largely important, particularly as a republican national administration is just launched, to know whether not only appointments to office, not only treaties with foreign powers, but in the future, and possibly in the very near future, legislative measures of all descriptions are to be delivered, I will not say delivered up, to the tender mercies of democratic committees. My friend from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] who is a good democrat, knows how much that means. He knows how small the chance would be of all the measures distinctively republican if like the lamb to be delivered for guardianship to the wolf they were to be given over to Senators who share his convictions and who believe in the party aims into some sort of belief in which he seems to have been beguiled.

Mr. President, that is this case as I understand it, better stated had it been more briefly stated. The question is whether anticipating by a few hours, after the lapse of many days, the accidental temporary majority of the Senate shall seize its organization, and I beg to say that by the word "seize" I intend to convey nothing offensive whatever—take, I will not say carry away as the Senator from Georgia, who is a lawyer, might add, but take the organization of the Senate. That is the question.

I submit to Senators on the other side that it will neither save time to attempt it, nor augment the democratic power to attempt it, nor conserve the success of the democratic party to attempt it, nor foster the good relations of members of the Senate to attempt it. It is more than possible that a day may come within the reach of all of us, when an example of this sort might lead some majority made a majority by the sickness or the casualty which had vacated a seat or two for a day to proceed upon the Rob Roy doctrine, "Let them take who have the power and let them keep who can." I believe it is not wise.

As the honorable Senator from Ohio when he bended his bow made me a mark for his arrow, I have chosen to avail myself of the currency and buoyancy which would be given to our proceedings to-day by the speech of the honorable Senator to have go along with his speech a statement which may in some sort exonerate me from having cast imputations upon anybody or having done anything which requires explanation, defense, or ill-feeling between Senators, neighbors or parties.

This is a very plain practical matter, and I am willing to hazard my reputation as a guesser—I have none as a prophet—upon the prediction that if our honorable friends will let us go into executive session or will in some other way arrange this temporary inequality, they will in the end gain all they can possibly gain, and they will gain it upon terms more satisfactory to them afterward than to have attempted by a proceeding (which I will not characterize lest the honorable Senator might think there was something caustic in my terms) which seems to me quite beside the purpose, not likely to save time and not likely to preserve what I am willing to assume every Senator at least as much as I is willing and anxious to preserve of the character, the decorum, and the prestige of the Senate.

DEATH OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution and to have it read for information at this time, when I shall ask that it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States of America, now convened in special session, has been informed of the death, by unlawful and inhuman violence, of His Majesty the Emperor Alexander II of Russia:

Resolved, That the Senate unites its voice with that of all civilized people in denouncing assassination as a means of redress for any grievances, either real or imaginary.

2. That, remembering and cherishing with satisfaction the relations of genuine friendship that have always existed between the people and the Governments of Russia and of the United States, to the strengthening and maintenance of which the late emperor has earnestly contributed his great influence, the Senate extends to the Government and people of Russia its sincere condolence in this sad national bereavement.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate deliver a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, with the request that he communicate the same to the Russian Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And be printed.

Mr. MORGAN subsequently said: At the suggestion of various Senators, I wish to call up the resolution I offered to-day. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read by the Secretary.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that the resolution I offered this morning has gone to the printer, and is not now in the possession of the Secretary of the Senate. That being the case, I suppose we can have no action to-day, and I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to suggest that the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Alabama will have double force in the eyes of the people with whom it expresses sympathy if it can be promptly passed, and I hope the request that it shall go over for consideration until to-morrow will be withdrawn, and that it may be now taken up.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolution is not now present.

Mr. HOAR. It has been heard by every one.

Mr. MORGAN. I move, then, the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks for the present consideration of the resolution which was offered by him. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

DEPUTY MARSHALS AT INDIANA ELECTION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to communicate to the Senate the names of the deputy United States marshals appointed in the State of Indiana to attend the polls at the October election for the year 1880, in said State, together with the respective localities where such deputy marshals were placed on duty, and also the names of such general deputies as were appointed with reference to said election.

Mr. HOAR. Let that resolution go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. PENDLETON March 10 for the appointment of standing committees.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, whatever else may be said of the Senate of the United States, I think on all hands it will be agreed that it should be a place where no masquerading ought to be tolerated. Senators should deal candidly with each other as well as with the country. We owe it not only to ourselves but to the place in which we are assembled. No man in this body has a right to put members of the body in a false position even if we concede that any Senator has a right to put himself in a false position.

I for one have favored the organization of the Senate without delay. I am aware, as all other Senators are aware, that the Senate cannot proceed with the discharge of its duties, duties which the President of the United States is constantly and daily exacting of us, without that organization, and because it is our duty to transact the business of the Senate I have favored the organization of the committees.

The country is witnessing a most singular exhibition, an exhibition for which there ought to be a very strong and controlling reason. For the first time in the history of the United States Senate the regular, orderly, timely, proper organization of the committees is resisted, resisted by an entire party, resisted by a great party. But one reason has been given or intimated. That reason, if I understand Senators correctly, is that by waiting a few days the Senate committees would be organized in a manner different from the organization that must result if they are organized now; and therefore to get what they claim to be their legitimate party advantage in the organization of the Senate gentlemen on the other side insist that the organization shall be postponed. The only reason given why they would have an advantage a few days hence that they do not now have is the fact they state that no less than four seats on this floor have been vacated, one by death and three by the action of the President. That is true.

Mr. President, let us come to the point. The Senator from New York has repeated over and over again in language too plain to be misunderstood, (he has not stated it as his opinion; if I understand his language he has affirmed as a fact,) that within a few days the republicans will control a constitutional majority of the Senate, and that that constitutional majority will have it in its power to select the committees. If not his language, at least what we have regarded as the imputations of the distinguished Senator are to the effect that we on this side are seeking to precipitate the organization now, because we may procure an organization now for a few days which we cannot procure when the Senate is full.

Let us come to the fact; it is the great fact. I have believed that when every seat shall be filled the Senate will be democratic, precisely as it is now. If I am wrong in that belief I have been deceived; if the Senator from New York is correct in his statement, I have been deceived. I owe it to myself, I owe it to the country, I owe it to those with whom I am associated on this floor, to state distinctly to the country and in this presence why I say the Senate will continue to be democratic when all the seats shall be filled. If I am right in that conclusion, the Senator has no right to say that we are seeking an advantage now which we cannot have when the Senate is full.

Mr. CONKLING, (in his seat.) Suppose you wait and see.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no doubt the Senator is anxious for us to wait. That is what he says. We have heard that before, and he has a most apt way of interrupting a gentleman's argument by putting in something that does not belong to it. He seeks, I suppose, thereby to break the force of it.

I have a list of the Senators before me chosen by the Legislatures of the several States to the Forty-seventh Congress, except the few the Senator mentioned who have not yet arrived. I assume what I believe is true, that every Senator yet to arrive will be a republican; I believe all the seats vacated will be filled by republicans; but when full how will the Senate stand? That is the question. I have the list before me. I state what every man knows, that the Senate when full consists of seventy-six members. Thirty-eight members of the body now sitting here were elected to the body as democrats. Let that fact go to the country. Thirty-eight members of the Senate now in the hearing of my voice were sent here commissioned to sit here as democrats. They hold no commission that was not given to them as democrats and by democrats. That thirty-eight amounts to precisely half the Senate. One member of the Senate, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] was not sent here as a democrat. He was sent here by democratic votes, and in words of high and lofty patriotism and fidelity to trust worthy of the very best days of this Republic he announced on Friday that he would be true to the trust that sent him here and which he agreed to fulfill.

Mr. HOAR. I understood him to announce that he thought the democratic organization was contrary to his taste and his judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. And his conscience too.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall be excused if I do not reply to that statement. The Senator from Illinois needs no defense. His words are on record; his words have gone to the country; and if the country has not lost its reverence for high fidelity and manly patriotism they will electrify the country with pleasure and delight. In this day, when so many evils have afflicted us, fidelity at least ought to be cherished and have its reward—fidelity in this high, conspicuous place, which stands the very focus of the nation's blaze, where no man can dare to be treacherous.

This being true, I challenge contradiction to the statement I make when I say there are thirty-nine members of the Senate now sitting here commissioned by democrats, elected by democratic votes. Thirty-nine constitute two majority of this body when full. Yet in the face of this high presence, in the face of the nation, the leading Senator on the other side, the great Senator from the great State of New York, rises and repeats over and over again that when the Senate shall be full it will have a constitutional majority of republicans. How has that been accomplished? That is the question. It was not accomplished by the people. It was not accomplished by the Legislatures of the States. How? By whom? When? For what purpose has that wonderful coalition been accomplished by which somebody sent here as a democrat has been seized on—no, I will not say seized; I will imitate the words of the distinguished Senator from New York—taken and carried away to the republican party? Who did it? The Senator from New York did not; I acquit him; I know him too well. Who did it? Who has seized, who has taken and carried away? How is it that we on this side have no right to act on the assumption that thirty-eight members who were sent to this body as democrats are not still democrats? Sir, I say they are, and I stand here to vindicate the honor, the integrity, the fidelity to State, to people, and to principle of all the thirty-eight who were sent here as democrats, and I deny that either has proven treacherous to his constituents or has falsified the commission that lies upon your table. The Senator from New York has done injustice to some democrat——

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator make it personal to himself?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir, and the Senator knows it; but I have a right to say, as I do say, that I assume that every man whom the Legislatures of the States sent to this body, worthy to hold a seat in this body, is true to the mission and the trust with which they clothed him, and when the Senator from New York intimates that somebody is false I say the Senator from New York does injustice to that somebody.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I think I ought to ask the Senator to allow me to interrupt him, as he refers to me so pointedly. I interrupt him to deny what the honorable Senator has said. I have neither stated nor implied that anybody was to be false to any understanding——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I will not yield further to the gentleman. He understands that I am not charging him with that.

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the honorable Senator to say that I had implied or charged that somebody was to be false, and I think it is quite fair and just, without being generous, that the Senator should allow me to interpose to say that my meaning, my statement, my implication, my belief is that everybody is to be true, and therefore that somebody is to be true to the opposition to a reigning element in this country, opposition to which sent him to this body. That is what I mean. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Order, order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that order is enforced in the galleries.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I was not astonished at the interruption, or the length of it, or the manner of it; nor do I object, nor will I complain; but I have said what the Senator will not dispute, that there are thirty-eight members of this body elected by democratic votes and sent here as democrats.

Mr. CONKLING. I do deny it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Thirty-eight sent as democrats, and one as an independent by democratic votes.

Mr. CONKLING. I do deny it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very well; the records of the country must settle that with the Senator. The Senator will say who was elected as a republican from any of the States to which I allude. I say what the whole world knows, that there are thirty-eight men on this floor elected as democrats, declaring themselves to be democrats, who supported Hancock, and who have supported the democratic ticket in every election that has occurred, and who were elected, moreover, by democratic Legislatures, elected by Legislatures which were largely democratic; and the Senator from New York will not deny it. One other Senator who was elected, not as a democrat, but as an independent, has announced his purpose to vote with us on this question. That makes thirty-nine, unless some man of the thirty-eight who was elected by a democratic Legislature proves false to his trust. Now, the Senator from New York does not say that somebody has been bought. No; I have not said that. He does not say somebody has been taken and carried away. No; I have not said that. But the Senator has said, and here is his language, and I hope he will not find it necessary to correct it:

> It may be said, very likely I shall be found to say despite some criticism that I may make upon so saying in advance, that notwithstanding the words "during the present session," day after to-morrow or the day after that, if the majority then present in the Chamber changes, that majority may overthrow all this proceeding, obliterate it, and set up an organization of the Senate in conformity with and not in contradiction of the edict of the election.

The presidential election he was referring to—

> If an apology is needed for the objection which I feel to that, it will be found I think in the circumstance that a majority, a constitutional majority of the Senate, is against that resolution, is against the formation of committees democratic in inspiration and persuasion, to which are to go for this session all executive matters.

The Senator has announced to-day that the majority on this side of the Chamber was only temporary. He has announced over and over that it was to be a temporary majority. I meet him on the fact. I say there are thirty-eight members sitting in this Hall to-day who were elected by democratic Legislatures and as democrats, and one distinguished Senator who was not elected as a democrat, but by democratic votes, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] has announced his purpose to vote with these thirty-eight democrats. Where, then, have I misrepresented? If that be true, and if those who were elected as democrats are not faithless to the constituency that elected them, you will not have the majority when the Senate is full.

Again, so far from charging the Senator from New York with being a personal party to this arrangement, I acquitted him boldly and fearlessly, for I undertake to say what I stated before, and I repeat it, to his credit, he is no party to an arrangement by which any man chosen by a democratic Legislature and as a democrat is not going to vote for the party that sent him here. Sir, I know too well what frowns would gather with lightning fierceness upon the brow of the Senator from New York if I were to intimate or any other man were to intimate that he, elected as a republican, because he happened to have a controlling vote was going to vote with the democrats on the organization. What would be insulting to him he cannot, he will not respect in another.

Now, sir, I say the Senator has been unjust in the conclusion which he has drawn, because it necessarily makes somebody who was chosen as a democrat ally himself with the republicans, not on great questions of policy, but on a question of organization, on a question of mere political organization. I assume that that has not been done. No man can charge that I have come forward and assumed that his fidelity was in question. I have assumed that the Senator from New York was wrong in his statement. Why? Because if any gentleman who was chosen to this body as a democrat has concluded not to vote with the democrats on the organization, he has not given us notice, and I take it for granted that when a gentleman changes his opinions, as every Senator has a right to change his opinions, his first duty is to give notice of that change to those with whom he has been associated. He has not given that notice; no democrat of the thirty-eight has given that notice to this side of the House. I therefore assume that no such change has occurred.

But there is another obligation. While I concede the right of any gentleman to change his opinions and change his party affiliations, yet I say that when he has arrived at the conclusion that duty requires him to make that change he must give notice to the constituency that sent him here. I have heard of no such notice. If the people of any of these democratic States, who through democratic Legislatures have sent thirty-eight democrats to this body and one more by democratic votes, have received notice of a change of party opinion or a change of party affiliations by any of those they sent here, I have not heard of it; the evidence of it has not been produced.

Sir, I concede the right of every man to change his opinions; I concede the right of every man to change his party affiliations; I concede the right of any man who was elected to the high place of a seat in this Senate as a democrat to change and become a republican; but I deny in the presence of this Senate, I deny in the hearing of this people, that any man has a right to accept a commission from one party and execute the trust confided to him in the interest of another party. Demoralized as this country has become, though every wind bears to us charges of fraud and bargain and corruption; though the highest positions in the land, we fear, have been degraded by being occupied by persons who procured them otherwise than by the popular will, yet I deny that the people of either party in this country have yet given any man a right to be faithless to a trust. They have given no man a right to accept a commission as a democrat and hold that commission and act with the republicans. Manhood, bravery, courage, fidelity, morality, respect for the opinions of mankind requires that whenever a man has arrived at the conclusion that he cannot carry out the trusts which was confided to him, he should return the commission and tell his constituents, "I have changed my mind and therefore return you the commission you gave me." Sir, I do not believe that a single one of the thirty-eight gentlemen who were elected as democrats and whose names are before me here, will hold in his pocket a commission conferred by democrats, conferred on him as a democrat, and without giving notice to his constituency, without giving notice to his associates, will execute that commission in the interest of the adversary party and go and communicate his conclusions, first of all, and only, to the members of the adversary party.

Sir, who is it that has changed? Whom of these thirty-eight does the Senator rely upon to vote with the republicans? That one has not notified us; he has not notified his constituency. Therefore I say it is not true, and I cannot sit here quietly and allow a gentleman on the other side of the Chamber, however distinguished, to get up here and assume and asseverate over and over that somebody elected as a democrat is faithless to his trust, and not repel it. No, gentlemen, you are deceived; you will be disappointed. I vindicate the character of American citizenship, I vindicate the honor of human nature when I say you will be disappointed, and no man elected as a democrat is going to help you organize the committees of this Senate. I do not say so because I know. No, I have no personal information, but I will stand here and affirm that no man who has been deemed by any constituency in this country to be worthy of a place in this body will be guilty of that treachery. And how is the Senator's majority to come? How many are there? He has not told us. The papers said this morning that there were two or three, and they named my good friend from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] When I saw that I knew the whole thing was absurd. The idea that anybody in this world would ever believe that my friend from Tennessee could possibly be guilty of such a thing, and my colleague [Mr. BROWN] also was named—gentlemen who were born and reared in the school of fidelity to their party. How many? Have you one? If you have but one that was elected as a democrat and who has concluded to go with the republicans, then you have only half, you have 38 to 38, and I suppose you count upon the vote of the Vice-President. Has that been arranged? Sir, I will not blame you if you vote for voting according to the sentiment that elected you, for voting according to the professions of your principles which you avowed when you were elected. I deny myself the right of the Vice-President to take part in the constitution and organization of this Senate; but I shall not make the question. If you have got one, the vote will be 38 to 38. Who is the one? Who is ambitious to do what no man in the history of this country has ever done, to be the first man to stand up in this high presence, after this country has reached fifty million people, and proclaim from this proud eminence that he disgraces the commission he holds. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped to order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Who is it? Who can he be? Do you receive him with affection? Do you receive him with respect? Is such a man worthy of your association? Such a man is not worthy to be a democrat. Is he worthy to be a republican? If my friend from Illinois, my friend from Kansas, or my friend from New York, were to come to me holding a republican commission in his pocket, sent here by a republican Legislature, and whisper to me "I will vote with the democrats on organization," I would tell him that if he so came he would be expelled with ignominy from the ranks of the party.

And why do you beg us to wait? If all who were elected as democrats are to remain democrats, what good will waiting do you? You will still be in a minority of two, the same minority you are in this morning.

Mr. President, I affirm that no man elected and sent here by a democratic Legislature as a democrat, whatever may have been local issues, whatever may have been the divisions of factions, and above all no man who professed to be a democrat when he was elected and who procured his election by professing to be a democrat, in the name of democracy and republicanism as well, in the name of American nature, I charge that no such man will prove false to his trust; and therefore why wait? Why delay the business of the country? Why should the nominations lie on the table unacted on? Why should we spend days and days here with the party on the other side filibustering for time to get delay, to get a few days? Why should we do that when upon the assumption that the Senate is not to blush at an exhibition of treachery the result will be the same one week, two weeks, six months, two years from now that it is now?

Sir, I know that there is a great deal in this question. The American people have had much to humiliate them; all peoples have much to humiliate them. I know that the patronage of this Government has become very great. I know that the distinguished gentleman who presides at the other end of the Avenue holds in his hand millions and hundreds of millions of patronage. To our shame be it said it has been whispered a hundred times all through the country by the presses of both parties until it has become absolutely familiar to American ears that the patronage of the Federal Government has been used to buy votes and control elections to keep one party in power. It is a question that confronts every honest statesman whether something shall not be done to lessen that patronage. I respond to the sentiment of the President in his inaugural when I say there ought to be a rule in even the civil service by which this patronage shall be placed where it cannot be used for such purposes. If it is not done, I do not know what humiliations are in store for us all.

But, Mr. President, here are facts that no man can escape. Gentlemen of the republican party of this Senate, you cannot organize the Senate unless you can get the vote of some man who was elected as a democrat. You cannot escape that. Have you gotten it? If so, how? If you have, nobody knows it but yourselves. How? There is no effect without a cause there is no change without a purpose; there is no bargain without a consideration. What is the cause? If there has been a change, why a change? How does it happen that you know the change and we do not? What induced the change? I deny that there has been a change. I maintain that all the distinguished gentlemen who make up the thirty-eight democrats on this side of the Chamber are firm, firm to the principles that sent them here, firm to the professions that sent them here, and firm to the constituencies that sent them here. They were elected as democrats. Now on the question of organization, which is nothing in the world but a pure political question and a party question at that, they will act with the democratic party, and you, gentlemen, will be deceived if you calculate otherwise. Therefore, there is no necessity for you to enter into all this filibustering and producing this delay for the purpose of getting the organization.

Mr. President, as I said before, the Senate should be a place where there should be no masquerading; men should deal frankly with each other. If I were to charge any gentleman on the republican side of the Chamber who was elected as a republican, who professed to be a republican when he was elected, with having made arrangements with the democrats to vote with them, I should insult him and he would resent it as an insult, and gentlemen excuse me for repelling the charge which if made against you, you would repel as an insult. I repel as an insult the charge made against any democrat that he would be false to his colors and is intending to vote with you on the organization.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise only to say that I regret that the honorable Senator from Georgia should have deemed it proper to dignify the miserable newspaper twaddle in respect to my political position——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to my friend I did not intend——

Mr. HARRIS. I am quite sure the Senator did not intend anything unkind to me; yet, by mentioning the matter here, he gives a dignity to it that it never could have had otherwise, and one that it is not worthy of, especially in view of the fact, as I very well know, that there is not a democrat or a republican in America, who knows me, who has ever doubted, or doubts to-day, what my political position is. It is unworthy of further notice, and I will notice it no more.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain you and the Senate more than a few minutes. The distinguished Senator from Georgia has manifestly engaged in an effort to disclose my position on this floor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know what your position is. How could I disclose it?

Mr. MAHONE. Sir, the Senator might be a little more direct as he might well have been in the course of his remarks in asking my position; and that I will give him.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator has assumed not only to be the custodian here of the democratic party of this nation, but he has dared to assert his right to speak for a constituency that I have the privilege, the proud and honorable privilege on this floor, of representing [applause in the galleries] without his assent, without the assent of such democracy as that he speaks for. [Applause in the galleries.] I owe them, sir, I owe you [addressing Mr. HILL] and those for whom you undertake to speak nothing in this Chamber. [Applause in the galleries.] I came here, sir, as a Virginian to represent my people, not to represent that democracy for which you stand. [Applause in the galleries.] I come with as proud a claim to represent that people as you to represent the people of Georgia, won on fields where I have vied with Georgians whom I commanded and others in the cause of my people and of their section in the late unhappy contest; but thank God for the peace and the good of the country that contest is over, and as one of those who engaged in it, and who has neither here nor elsewhere any apology to make for the part taken, I am here by my humble efforts to bring peace to this whole country, peace and good will between the sections, not here as a partisan, not here to represent that Bourbonism which has done so much injury to my section of the country. [Applause in the galleries.]

Now, sir, the gentleman undertakes to say what constitutes a democrat. A democrat! I hold, sir, that to-day I am a better democrat than he, infinitely better—he who stands nominally committed to a full vote, a free ballot, and an honest count. I should like to know how he stands for these things where tissue ballots are fashionable. [Laughter, and applause in the galleries.]

Now, sir, I serve notice on you that I intend to be here the custodian of my own democracy. I do not intend to be run by your caucus. I am in every sense a free man here. I trust I am able to protect my own rights and to defend those of the people whom I represent, and certainly to take care of my own. I do not intend that any Senator on this floor shall undertake to criticise my conduct by innuendoes, a method not becoming this body or a straightforward legitimate line of pursuit in argument.

I wish the Senator from Georgia to understand just here that we may get along in the future harmoniously, that the way to deal with me is to deal directly. We want no bills of discovery. Now, sir, you will find out how I am going to vote in a little while. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, during this temporary suspension——

Mr. MAHONE. I have not yielded the floor. I am waiting for a little order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the disorder in the Senate both when my friend from Georgia was speaking and now. I believe it has been some time since we have had as much disorder as we have had to-day in the galleries. I hope the Chair will enforce order.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that much of the disorder originated in the first place from the cheering on the democratic side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair announces that order must be maintained in the galleries; otherwise the Sergeant-at-Arms will be directed to clear the galleries.

Mr. MAHONE. I promised not to detain the Senate, and I regret that so early after my appearance here I should find it necessary to intrude any remarks whatsoever upon the attention of this body. I would prefer to be a little modest; I would prefer to listen and to learn; but I cannot feel content after what has passed in this presence, when the gentleman by all manner of methods, all manner of insinuations, direct and indirect, has sought to do that which would have been better done and more bravely pursued if he had gone directly to the question itself. He has sought to discover where the democrat was who should here choose to exercise his right to cast his vote as he pleased, who should here exercise the liberty of manhood to differ with his caucus. Why, sir, the gentleman seems to have forgotten that I refused positively to attend his little lovefeast; not only that, I refused to take part in a caucus which represents a party that has not only waged war upon me but upon those whom I represent on this floor. They have not only intruded within the boundaries of my own State, without provocation, to teach honesty and true democracy, but they would now pursue my people further by intruding their unsolicited advice and admonition to their representative in this Chamber. Yes, sir, you have been notified, duly notified that I would take no part or lot in any political machinery.

Further than that, you have been notified that I was supremely indifferent to what you did; that I had no wish to prefer, and was indifferent to your performances; that I should stand on this floor representing in part the people of the State of Virginia, for whom I have the right to speak (and not the Senator from Georgia) even of their democracy. The gentleman may not be advised that the Legislature which elected me did not require that I should state either that I was a democrat or anything else. I suppose he could not get here from Georgia unless he was to say that he was a democrat, anyhow. [Laughter.] I come here without being required to state to my people what I am. They were willing to trust me, sir, and I was elected by the people, and not by a legislature, for it was an issue in the canvass. There was no man elected by the party with which I am identified that did not go to the Legislature instructed by the sovereigns to vote for me for the position I occupy on this floor. It required no oath of allegiance blindly given to stand by your democracy, such as it is, [laughter,] that makes a platform and practices another thing. That is the democracy they have in some of the Southern States.

Now, I hope the gentleman will be relieved. He has been chassezing all around this Chamber to see if he could not find a partner somewhere; he has been looking around in every direction; occasionally he would refer to some other Senator to know exactly where the Senator was who stood here as a democrat that had the manhood and the boldness to assert his opinions in this Chamber free from the dictation of a mere caucus. Now, I want the gentleman to know henceforth and forever here is a man, sir, that dares stand up [applause] and speak for himself without regard to caucus in all matters. [Applause, long continued, in the galleries and on the floor.] Mr. President, pardon me; I have done.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. Gentlemen on the floor not members of the Senate will take seats.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope nobody imagines that I rise to make any particular reply to the remarkable exhibition we have just seen. I rise to say a few things in justification of myself. I certainly did not say one word to justify the gentleman in the statement that I made an assault upon him, unless he was the one man who had been elected as a democrat and was not going to vote with his party. I never saw that gentleman before the other day. I have not the slightest unkind feeling for him. I never alluded to him by name; I never alluded to his State; and I cannot understand how the gentleman says that I alluded to him except upon the rule laid down by the distinguished Senator from New York, that a guilty conscience needs no accuser. [Applause and hisses in the galleries.] I did not mention the Senator. It had been stated here by the Senator from New York over and over that the other side would have a majority when that side was full: I showed it was impossible that they should have a majority unless they could get one democratic vote, with the vote of the Vice-President. I did not know who it was; I asked who it was; I begged to know who it was; and to my utter astonishment the gentleman from Virginia comes out and says he is the man.

The Senator from Virginia makes a very strange announcement. He charged me not only with attacking him, but with attacking the people of Virginia. Did I say a word of the people of Virginia? I said that the people of no portion of this country would tolerate treachery. Was that attacking the people of Virginia? I said that thirty-eight men had been elected to this body as democrats. Does the Senator deny that? Does he say he was elected here not as a democrat? He says he was not required to declare that he was a democrat, and in the next breath he says he is a truer, better democrat than I am. Then I commend him to you. Take good care of him, my friends. Nurse him well. How do you like to have a worse democrat than I am?

Mr. CONKLING and others. A better democrat.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, a better! Then my friend from New York is a better democrat than I am. You have all turned democrats; and we have in the United States Senate such an exhibition as that of a gentleman showing his democracy by going over to the republicans!

Sir, I will not defend Virginia. She needs no defense. Virginia has given this country and the world and humanity some of the brightest names of history. She holds in her bosom to-day the ashes of some of the noblest and greatest men that ever illustrated the glories of any country. I say to the Senator from Virginia that neither Jefferson, nor Madison, nor Henry, nor Washington, nor Leigh, nor Tucker, nor any of the long list of great men that Virginia has produced ever accepted a commission to represent one party and came here and represented another. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I trust that those at least who are enjoying the privilege of the floor of the Senate Chamber will be prohibited from cheering.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the violation of the rules does not appear to be in the galleries, but by persons who have been admitted to the privilege of the floor. The Chair regrets to clear the floor, but if the manifestation is continued he will be obliged to do so. It is a violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MAHONE rose.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does the Senator from Virginia wish to interrupt me?

Mr. MAHONE. I do wish to interrupt you.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MAHONE. I understand you to say that I accepted a commission from one party and came here to represent another. Do I understand you correctly?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understood that you were elected as a democrat.

Mr. MAHONE. Never mind; answer the question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, I say you accepted a commission, having been elected as a democrat. That is my information.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask you the question: Did you say that I had accepted a commission from one party and came here to represent another? That is the question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, I said that will be the case if you vote with the republicans. You have not done it yet, and I say you will not do it.

Mr. MAHONE. If not out of order in this place, I say to the gentleman that if he undertakes to make that statement it is unwarranted and untrue.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I should like to ask the gentleman a question: Was he not acting with the democratic party, and was he not elected as a democrat to this body? Answer that question.

Mr. MAHONE. Quickly, sir. I was elected as a readjuster. Do you know what they are? [Laughter and applause.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand there are in Virginia what are called readjuster democrats and debt-paying democrats, or something of that kind, but as I understand they are all democrats. We have nothing to do with that issue. We are not to settle the debt of Virginia in the Senate Chamber; but I ask the Senator again, was he not elected to this body as a member of the national democratic party?

Mr. MAHONE. I will answer you, sir. No. You have got the answer now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then I conceive that the gentleman spoke truly when he said that I do not know what he is. What is he? Everybody has understood that he voted with the democrats. Did he not support Hancock for the Presidency? Did not the Senator support Hancock for the Presidency, I ask him? [A pause.] Dumb! Did he not act with the democratic party in the national election, and was not the Senator from Virginia himself a democrat? That is the question. Why attempt to evade? Gentlemen, I commend him to you. Is there a man on that side of the Chamber who doubts that the Senator was sent to this body as a democrat? Is there a man in this whole body who doubts it? Is there a man in Virginia who doubts it? The gentleman will not deny it. Up to this very hour it was not known on this side of the Chamber or in the country how he would vote in this case, or whether he was still a democrat or not. I maintain that he is. The Senator from New York seemed to have information that somebody who was elected as a democrat was not, and I went to work to find out who it was. It seems I have uncovered him. For months the papers of the country have been discussing and debating how the Senator would vote. Nobody could know, nobody could tell, nobody could guess. I have been a truer friend to the Senator than he has been to himself. I have maintained always that when it came to the test the Senator would be true to his commission; that the Senator would be true to the democratic professions he made when he was elected. He will not rise in this presence and say he could have been elected to the Senate as a republican. He will not rise in the Senate and say he could have been elected to the Senate if he had given notice that on the organization of this body he would vote with the republicans. He will not say it.

The gentleman makes some remarks about the caucus. I have no objection to a gentleman remaining out of a caucus. That is not the question. I have no objection to a gentleman being independent. That is not the question. I have no objection to a gentleman being a readjuster in local politics. That is not the question. I have no objection to a man dodging from one side to another on such a question. With that I have nothing to do. That is a matter of taste with him; but I do object to any man coming into this high council, sent here by one sentiment, commissioned by one party, professing to be a democrat, and after he gets here acting with the other party. If the gentleman wants to be what he so proudly said, a man, when he changes opinions as he had a right to do, when he changes party affiliations as he had a right to do, he should have gone to the people of Virginia and said, "You believed me to be a democrat when you gave me this commission; while I differed with many of you on the local question of the debt, I was with you cordially in national politics; I belonged to the national democratic party; but I feel that it is my duty now to co-operate with the republican party, and I return you the commission which you gave to me." If the gentleman had done that and then gone before the people of Virginia and asked them to renew his commission upon his change of opinion, he would have been entitled to the eulogy of manhood he pronounced upon himself here in such theatrical style. I like manhood.

I say once more, it is very far from me to desire to do the Senator injury. I have nothing but the kindest feelings for him. He is very much mistaken if he supposes I had any personal enmity against him. I have not the slightest. As I said before, I never spoke to the gentleman in my life until I met him a few days ago; but I have done what the newspapers could not do, both sides having been engaged in the effort for months; I have done what both parties could not do, what the whole country could not do—I have brought out the Senator from Virginia.

But now, in the kindest spirit, knowing the country from which the honorable Senator comes, identified as I am with its fame and its character, loving as I do every line in its history, revering as I do its long list of great names, I perform the friendly office unasked of making a last appeal to the honorable Senator, whatever other fates befall him, to be true to the trust which the proud people of Virginia gave him, and whoever else may be disappointed, whoever else may be deceived, whoever else may be offended at the organization of the Senate, I appeal to the gentleman to be true to the people, to the sentiment, to the party which he knows commissioned him to a seat in this body.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have but a word to say. I have listened to a very extraordinary speech. The Senate of the United States is a body where each Senator has a right to have a free voice. I have never known before a Senator, especially a new Senator, to be arraigned in the manner in which the Senator from Virginia has been, and his conduct criticised before he had performed any official act, save one, so far as voting is concerned. He needs no defense at my hands; he is able to take care of himself; but I tell the Senator from Georgia when he says to this country that no man has a right to come here unless he fulfills that office which was dictated to him by a party, he says that which does not belong to American independence. Sir, it takes more nerve, more manhood, to strike the party shackles from your limbs and give free thought its scope than any other act that man can perform. The Senator from Georgia himself, in times gone by, has changed his opinions. If the records of this country are true (and he knows whether they are or not) he, when elected to a convention as a Union man, voted for secession. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will pardon me a moment, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there has been more disorder in this Chamber during this brief session of the Senate than in all the aggregate of many years before. I take occasion when a gentleman with whose opinions I perfectly agree myself is speaking to say that I shall move the Chair to clear any portion of the gallery from which expressions of applause or dissent shall come if they occur again.

Mr. LOGAN. What I have said in reference to his record I do not say by way of casting at the Senator, but merely to call attention to the fact that men are not always criticised so severely for changing their opinions. The Senator from Georgia spoke well of my colleague. Well he may. He is an honorable man and a man deserving well of all the people of this country. He was elected not as a democrat but by democratic votes. He votes with you. He never was a democrat in his life; he is not to-day. You applaud him and why? Because he votes with you. You want his vote; that is all. You criticise another man who was elected by republican votes and democratic votes, readjusters as they are called, and say that he has no right to his opinions in this Chamber. The criticism is not well. Do you say that a man shall not change his political opinions?

The Senator from Georgia in days gone by, in my boyhood days, I heard of, not as a democrat. To-day he sits here as a democrat. No one wishes to criticise him because he has changed his political opinions. He had a right to do so. I was a democrat once, too, and I had a right to change my opinions and I did change them. The man who will not change his opinions when he is honestly convinced that he was in error is a man who is not entitled to the respect of men. I say this to the Senator from Georgia. The Senator says to us "take him," referring to the Senator from Virginia. Yes, sir, we will take him if he will come with us, and we will take every other honest man who will come. We will take every honest man in the South who wants to come and join the republican party, and give him the right hand of fellowship, be he black or white. Will you do as much?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We have got them already.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, and if a man happens to differ with you the tyranny of political opinion in your section of country is such that you undertake to lash him upon the world and try to expose him to the gaze of the public as a man unfaithful to his trust. We have no such tyranny of opinion in the country where I live; and it will be better for your section when such notions are driven to the shades and retired from the action of your people.

I do not know that the gentleman from Virginia intends to vote as a republican. I have never heard him say so. I know only what he has said here to-day; but I respect him for stating to the Senate and the country that he is tired of the Bourbon democracy; and if more men were tired of it the country would be better off. The people are getting tired of it even down in your country, everywhere. The sooner we have a division down there the better it will be for both sides, for the people of the whole country.

I did not rise to make any defense of the Senator from Virginia, for he is able, as I said, to defend himself, but merely to say to the Senator from Georgia that the criticism made upon that Senator without any just cause is something I never witnessed before in this Chamber or in any other deliberative body, and in my judgment it was not justified in any way whatever.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I desire to say once more, what everybody in this audience knows is true, that I did not arraign the Senator from Virginia. In the first speech I never alluded to Virginia or to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. LOGAN. Every one in the Chamber knew to whom the Senator alluded.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I alluded to somebody who was elected as a democrat, and who was going to vote as a republican.

Mr. TELLER. He was not elected as a democrat.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then I did not allude to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator said that thirty-eight members of the Senate were elected as democrats.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly they were.

Mr. TELLER. That is a mistake.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly they were, and the record shows it.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me go on and then you can follow me. I again say it is strange that the Senator from Virginia should say I arraigned him, and his valiant defender, the Senator from Illinois, comes to defend him from an arraignment that was never made.

Mr. LOGAN. Did not the Senator from Georgia ask the Senator from Virginia in his seat if he was not elected as a democrat? Did not the Senator charge that a man was acting treacherously to his constituents? Did the Senator not make the most severe arraignment of him that he could possibly make?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I did that only after the Senator from Virginia had arraigned himself. The Senator from Virginia insisted that I alluded to him when I had not called his name, and I had not alluded to his State and when I had arraigned nobody.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him this question: Did he not have in his mind distinctly the Senator from Virginia when he made his insinuations?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer the gentleman's question fairly. I did believe that the gentlemen on the other side who were counting upon a democratic vote were counting upon the Senator from Virginia, but I equally believed that they would be disappointed. I did not believe that the Senator from Virginia was guilty, and I in perfect sincerity and good faith, so far from arraigning him, intended to defend him from the foul suspicion, and my honest repulsion of the insinuation, which was necessary in consequence of what they expected, was regarded by the Senator himself as an arraignment. There is an anecdote told in the life of the great minister, Whitfield. When he was speaking one day in the country to an audience, he described the enormity of sin and the characteristics of sin; he did it with wonderful power. When he came out he was assailed by a gentleman for having made a personal assault on him. "Why," said Whitfield, "I never heard of you before; I did not intend any assault upon you." He replied, "Well, sir, you told me everything I have been doing all my life." I frankly confess I am not a man to dodge. The papers have justified me in believing, Senators have justified me in believing, that you are calculating to get the democratic vote of the Senator from Virginia, whom the whole country has treated as having been elected as a democrat. I believed you would be disappointed; I believed that because you would be disappointed it was wholly unnecessary to delay this organization. I did not believe the Senator would vote with you, and in vindication of that Senator I will not believe it yet. He has not said so. He has made the mistake, because of what the papers say, of assuming that I alluded to him; but I vindicate him yet. He said if I asserted that he was elected as a democrat and would be false to his commission, I said what was not warranted and what was untrue. I am glad he said so. I did not say he would; but I say you expected it, I say your papers expected it, and I say it has been calculated on. I vindicate the Senator from Virginia, and I hope he will vindicate himself by not doing what you expect him to do.

The Senator from Illinois charges me again with criticising a man for changing his opinion. I distinctly said that every man in this country has a right to change his opinion. The distinguished Senator from Illinois has changed his opinion. He says the country is tired of Bourbon democracy. He ought to know, for he used to be one of the worst Bourbon democrats this country ever saw.

Mr. LOGAN. That was when you belonged to the other side.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The first time I ever heard of that Senator was when I was battling in the South for the good old whig principles and he was an outrageous Bourbon democrat. That amounts to nothing. You had a right to change, if you have changed; I do not say you have.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say, if the Senator will allow, me that when I saw the light I changed for the right. The Senator saw the darkness and changed for the wrong.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Ah, that is not argument.

Mr. LOGAN. It is true, however, just the same.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I hope the Senator will see more light and change again.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think I shall.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. He needs a great deal of light.

Mr. LOGAN. No doubt of that. I do not expect to get it, however, from that side.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I object to this style of interruption; it is unworthy of the Senate. I am not here to indulge in such remarks. The Senator has a right to change; I have arraigned nobody for changing his opinion. If the Senator from Virginia has changed his opinions he has a right to change them; I have not said he has not. I do not deny his right. I admit that a man has a right also to change his party affiliations if he is convinced he has been wrong; but a man has no right to hold a commission which was given him while he was a democrat and because he was a democrat and given to him as a democrat, and change his opinions and act with the adversary party. It is his duty to return that commission to the people who gave it and ask them to renew it upon his change of opinion. That is all I ask.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what right has he as a Senator to undertake to dictate to the Senator from Virginia as to what shall be required in his State?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is incorrect again. I have not undertaken to dictate to the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia can do just as he pleases; but when the Senator from Virginia acts as a public man I have a right to my opinion of his public acts, and I have a right to speak of all public acts and their character. I will not deny his right; I am not dictating to him—far from it. There is not in my heart now an unkind feeling for the Senator from Virginia. I would if I could rescue him from the infamy into which others are trying to precipitate him. That is what I want to do. I am not assailing him; I am not arraigning him; I am not dictating to him. I know the proud nature of the Senator from New York. I know if that Senator was elected to this body as a republican, although he might have been a readjuster at the time, and if he should come to this body and the democrats should begin to intimate in this Hall and the democratic papers should intimate over the country that he was going to vote with the democrats on the organization, he would feel insulted just as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] justly felt by the allusions to him in the newspapers. So with any other man on that side. If the Senator from Virginia was elected as a democrat I am right; but if as a republican I have nothing more to say.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there? Is it not true that the democracy of the Virginia Legislature that elected the Senator now in his seat from Virginia did nominate Mr. Withers as their candidate and supported him, and was not this Senator elected by the opponents of the democrats of that Legislature? Is not that true? I ask the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MAHONE. Substantially so.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if that be true, why say that he came here as the representative of the democracy of Virginia?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. My understanding is that the democracy of Virginia is very much like the democracy of other States, as Tennessee. We are divided down there in several States on local questions that have nothing to do with national politics. In Virginia the democracy was divided between what are called readjuster democrats and debt-paying democrats, but all democrats.

What was called the republican party it was said, although I must vindicate many of the republicans in the State from the charge, coalesced with what are called the readjuster democrats. The late Senator from Virginia was nominated by what are called the debt-paying democrats, and the present Senator from Virginia, as I understand it, was run against him as a readjuster democrat.

Mr. LOGAN. And the republicans all supported him.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, because they always support a candidate who is running against the regular nominee. I suppose the republicans always go for men who are not in favor of paying debts! I had thought that republicans professed to affiliate with those who would pay debts. But I have nothing to do with that question; it does not come in here. What I say and what will not be denied, and I am ashamed that there is an attempt to deny it, is, and it is the worst feature of this whole thing, that anybody should get up here and attempt to deny that the Senator from Virginia was elected to the Senate as a democrat; should attempt to evade the fact that he was a Hancock democrat last year; that he has acted with the national democracy all the time; and that whatever might have been the local differences in Virginia he has been a national democrat every hour, held out to the country as such. I say I am ashamed that anybody should attempt to make a question of that fact. He was not only a democrat, a national democrat, and voted for Hancock, but I remember the historical fact that he had what was called his own ticket in the field for Hancock and voted for it. He is just as much a democrat, sent here as a readjuster democrat, as the other candidate, the debt-paying democrat, would have been if he had been elected.

Mr. LOGAN. The difference is, if the Senator will allow me, if the other had been elected he would have been in full accord with the democracy here. This gentleman does not happen to be, and therefore the criticism of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not wish to do the republicans of Virginia injustice; I do not wish to do anybody injustice. There are some republicans in Virginia for whom I confess, if reports be true, I have a profound respect. When a portion of the democrats, under the cry of readjusterism, sought to get the support of the republicans of Virginia, there were manly republicans who refused to go into a coalition that would compromise the character of the State on the question of its debt. I am told there are republicans now in Virginia who say that if republicanism here means the Senator from Virginia, and you accept him as a republican, you must give them up as republicans. I do not know how true it is. But this is unworthy of the Senate.

I repeat, the worst feature of this whole transaction is that anybody should get up here and attempt to make an impression that there was a doubt as to the democracy of the Senator from Virginia heretofore. That is an evasion unworthy of the issue, unworthy of the place, unworthy of the occasion, unworthy of Virginia, unworthy of the Senator, unworthy of his defenders. Admit the fact that he was a democrat, elected as a democrat, and then claim that he exercised the inalienable right of changing his opinions and his party affiliations, but do not claim that he had a right to do it in the manner you say he has done it.

Once more let me say, the Senator from Virginia ought to know that by all the memories of the past there is not a man in this body whose whole soul goes out more in earnest to protect his honor than my own. I would rather lose the organization of the Senate by the democratic party and never again have a democratic committee in this body than have Virginia soiled with dishonor. I do not say that the Senator is going to do it, but I see the precipice yawning before him. I see whither potential influences are leading him. I know the danger just ahead. I would rescue him if I could. He may say it is enmity; he may say it is an unfriendly spirit; he will live to know the force of the words I am uttering. Men in this country have a right to be democrats; men in this country have a right to be republicans; men in this country have a right to divide on national issues and local issues; but no man has a right to be false to a trust, I repeat it, and whether the Senator from Virginia shall be guilty or not is not for me to judge and I will not judge. I say if he votes as you want him to vote God save him or he is gone. If he comes here to illustrate his democracy by going over to that side of the House and voting with that side of the House, he will be beyond my rescue. No, gentlemen, I honor you. I like a proud republican as well as I do a proud democrat. I am conscious of the fact that some of the best personal friends I have in this body sit on that side of the Chamber, men whose high character I would trust anywhere and everywhere. Gentlemen, you know your hearts respond to every word I am uttering when I say you despise treachery, and you honor me to-day for making an effort to rescue a gentleman, not from treachery, but from the charge of it. If the Senator shall vote as you desire him to vote, he cannot escape the charge.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I want to interrupt the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MAHONE. I cannot allow you to make any such insinuation.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I make no insinuation.

Mr. MAHONE. You did emphatically, and it was unmanly. Now it must stop. Let us understand that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I repeat, I do not know how the Senator is going to vote. I believe he is not going to vote as you expect. I believe he is not going to be guilty of being false to his commission. I will not charge that he will; I will not insinuate that he will. I have not insinuated it. The gentleman must be his own keeper; the gentleman must solve his own questions; but I repeat, I repeat as a friend, I repeat as a friend whose friendship will be appreciated some day, that the Senator is in danger of bringing upon himself a charge which he will never have the power to explain.

Mr. MAHONE. I cannot allow you or any other man to make that charge without a proper answer.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, well.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I had no intention of taking part in this debate, and I do not now propose to detain the Senate for any length of time. But I think it due to myself, I think it due to the character of the Senate, I think it due to American manhood to express my emphatic indignation at the exhibition which the Senator from Georgia has made so degrading as it seems to me to the character of this body. It is the first time in the political history of this country that a Senator has risen in his place and undertaken in advance of the act to deliver a lecture to his peer and to inform him that if he should do what is desired by one-half of the members of this body he will do an act which he proceeds to pronounce degrading and treacherous.

It is none of the business of the Senator from Georgia how any other Senator in this body shall cast his vote. Each of us is responsible to his country, to his State, to his conscience, to his God, and in whatever part of this Republic we may dwell no slavemaster or plantation overseer is to wave his whip over the heads of American Senators. [Applause in the galleries.] Every utterance that came from the lips of the Senator from Georgia was an insult to the representatives of the American people who sit in these seats. The Senator no more understands what is due to the honor of an honorable man to-day than when chosen as a Union man to a State convention he cast the vote which carried that State into the rebellion. He has learned nothing either of consistency, of constitutional duty, of propriety, of personal behavior, of what constitutes true manhood, from that day to this.

The Senator's speech was degrading also by reason of the petty degrading test which he applies to the conduct of Senators. The question whether a Senator's vote will in the judgment of the individual Senator advance the interest of the country, whether it will advance the interest of the State he represents, has not been mooted in the two or three elaborate harangues we have heard from the lips of the Senator from Georgia. What he owes to this or that party, whether democratic or republican votes were counted when he was declared elected to his seat, whether his vote is to advance the interests of this or that party, seems to be the consideration which arises in the mind of the Senator from Georgia.

Why, he has undertaken to draw a comparison between the position of my honorable friend from Illinois and that of the new Senator from Virginia, who had just taken his seat. With much honeyed commendation he compares the honorable Senator from Illinois to the sages and saints of the early and better days of the Republic. The Senator from Georgia was lost in admiration of the virtue and the consistency and the fidelity of his esteemed neighbor, the Senator from Illinois; and why? The Senator from Illinois, having been elected four years ago by the Legislature of a State which had an average republican majority of from 50,000 to 100,000, having been chosen by a Legislature containing a republican majority, but owing his election to the votes partly of democrats and partly of republicans, according to my honorable friend from Georgia——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator certainly did not listen to my speech the other day.

Mr. HOAR. I am not criticising the position of the Senator from Illinois. I am criticising the statement of difference made by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I never said——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Just wait a moment. The fact is all I want to state. The fact is the republicans were not in the majority in that Legislature; that I stated; they were numerically in the plurality. The independents of that body and the democrats elected me to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The independents were republicans, were they not?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Some of them were democrats and some of them were republicans, but like me they had gone into the liberal movement of 1872.

Mr. HOAR. But the people of Illinois now and ever since have been largely republican. I am not criticising the position of my honorable friend from Illinois. I should deem it unworthy of me as a gentleman, saying nothing of my position as a Senator, to undertake to suggest that anything but his own conscience and his own sense of duty was to give the law to him in casting the vote which he has to give. But when the Senator from Illinois was elected from a State containing ordinarily a large majority of republicans, because there was an accidental majority of democrats and independent republicans in that State, he thought it his duty to cast his vote for the democratic organization of the Senate, although, as he informs us, it was repugnant alike to his taste and his judgment in many particulars. The Senator from Virginia owes his seat to a State which casts 84,000 republican votes and 34,000 independent democratic or readjuster votes, making 118,000, and only 96,000 votes representing the Bourbon or regular democracy. He votes, if he does vote, for an organization which commends itself to his taste and his judgment. That is the only difference between him and the Senator from Illinois, whom his neighbor from Georgia so much admires. Is the Senator a traitor who represents 22,000 majority of the people of his own State in voting as he thinks right, and the Senator a Washington who represents a minority of the people of his State in voting as he thinks wrong? That is the logic of the honorable Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will say to the Senator that the democrats and independents elected me to the Senate. I chose to be elected by them, and accepted the office from them. Because the democrats were largely in the majority they had a right at any rate to suppose that I would not turn the democratic organization out of power in this Senate. That is the reason, and I gave it the other day.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Illinois would not turn a dog out of power under those circumstances, and nobody supposes he would. I am not criticising him, I repeat.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Then why keep carping if you are not criticising?

Mr. HOAR. My friend from Illinois missed the delightful pleasure of hearing his own eulogy pronounced by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I was not in.

Mr. HOAR. He was not in the Chamber, and so missed the chance of knowing in his life-time, what none of the rest of us will know until we die, what the Senator from Georgia thinks of us, and I am responding to the speech in which the honorable Senator from Georgia drew a parallel between the virtuous Senator from Illinois who votes with the democrats and the wicked Senator from Virginia who he fears will vote with the republicans; and that is all.

But, Mr. President, there is something deeper; there is something certainly deeper in this country than a party name or a party attachment or a party affiliation. The Senator from Virginia, in his eloquent speech, told us in a very significant utterance of a democratic party in the South that put one thing into its platform and enacted quite another thing in its political conduct. He told us of a democratic party in Virginia, under whatever name they choose to be called, who mean at least that if democracy triumphs in this country in future it shall triumph in a fair field, and who believe that deeper than democracy is the right of every American citizen to cast his vote as he pleases, and to have that vote honestly counted as it is cast. There are democrats in the South who mean in future to overcome their political antagonists by reasoning with them, and not by cheating them; there are democrats in the South who mean, if they can, to vote down the men with whom they differ, but who do not mean to assassinate them; and if there be such democrats, their place is with the republican party until that result is accomplished. There are democrats in the South who mean, in the language of one of the most eloquent utterances I have lately heard from human lips, "to live in a nation and not in an aggregation of petty provinces" any longer. There are democrats in the South who do not mean to live any longer in the graveyards and among the tombs, whose face is toward the morning and upon whose brow the rising sunlight of the future glory of this country is already beginning to be visible. To such democrats, if the advance courier of their column has at length reached the Senate Chamber, after long waiting and yearning, the republicans of the North desire to stretch forth a friendly hand. It is for no purpose of petty bargain or barter; it is inspired by no miserable ambition for office or political victory; but it is in the spirit of that patriotism which loves the South as much as it loves the North, it is in the spirit of a united and not a divided country, it is in the spirit of the future and not of the past, it is in the spirit of Union and not sectionalism that we are willing to hold out our hand to those brave and noble democrats of Virginia whose representative takes his seat today on this floor.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, in view of the progress we are making toward an organization, I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No!" "No!"] I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on all political questions.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Hale,	McDill,	Saunders,

ABSENT—3.

Edmunds,	Garland,	Mahone.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 35, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—35.

ABSENT—2.

Edmunds, Garland.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins,

Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—5.

Allison,	Garland,	Plumb,	Saunders.
Edmunds,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir, I withdraw it.

Mr. INGALLS. While it is not in order to refer to anything that has been done in executive session, it is not improper that I should call the attention of the Senate to the entry that appears on the last page of the printed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the proceedings of Friday last. The part to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate reads as follows:

> Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.
> The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. While the doors were closed, Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his appeal from the decision of the Chair; and Mr. CONKLING, by unanimous consent, withdrew the point of order submitted by him this morning; and the resolution submitted by Mr. PENDLETON was considered to be the pending business.

That is a legislative record of what transpired in executive session, to which I can properly refer. At the time when those proceedings were had, there were seventy-two seats in this Senate that were filled. Since that time two of the vacancies have been filled by the introduction of the Senators from Iowa and Wisconsin, who appeared this morning and took the oaths of office. It is understood that the vacancy from Minnesota has been filled by executive appointment, and that the appointee is now upon his way hither and will probably arrive not later than Wednesday morning. It is a matter of history that the Legislature of Maine is now in session, that a gentleman who is in the city has been nominated to fill the vacancy from that State, that the Legislature will sit to-morrow to vote separately, and that on Wednesday the result, of which there can be no doubt, will be declared in both houses, and that probably the result will be telegraphed here by the governor, so that nothing but a mere technicality will interfere with the Senator from Maine being sworn in on Thursday, or it may be Wednesday afternoon.

I do not desire to refer to any understandings that may have been had or to any tacit arrangements that may have been partially entered into by reason of which the action in the executive session of Friday last was taken and subsequently agreed to and ratified by the Senate in open session and reported upon the RECORD; but in view of the fact that but two vacancies now exist, that the persons to fill those vacancies will unquestionably be here by Wednesday or by Thursday morning at farthest, I rise in interest of the traditions of the Senate and to avoid what to me seems to be an unseemly struggle that will depend simply upon physical endurance, to ask whether we cannot reach by unanimous consent an agreement by which the further consideration of this resolution shall be postponed until Thursday morning next. There are but two legislative days intervening between this and that time. Nothing certainly can be made and nothing can be lost to either party by such an arrangement, and if it can be made upon a basis that will be equally agreeable and mutually satisfactory to both parties, I ask why we cannot now reach that consent?

As the Senator from Ohio has been hitherto the leader in this part of the business of the Senate, I appeal to him to reply if he knows any obstacle to an arrangement of that kind being reached.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I am not prepared to make a statement as to what agreement can be reached by unanimous consent. I am not authorized to speak to that extent. I dislike very much to see this struggle pushed to the point of a contest of physical endurance; and as the Senator from Kansas has undertaken in a friendly spirit of course, as I understand, to ask what this side of the Chamber will consent to, I would like to put to him a plain question, and which I hope he will receive in the spirit in which I ask it—that is, whether it is the determination of that side of the Chamber not to come to a vote to-night? The gentlemen will understand what I mean when I ask for "the determination"—not a wish, but a determination.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am not authorized to speak for any member of this body but myself. I have had no consultation with my colleagues. I do not know what they prefer or what they desire, or what they will consent to. As the Senator from Ohio appeals to me he must be aware that I have always insisted that fair dealing and justice required that the political equilibrium between the two parties should be observed and maintained until the seats were filled. I may be wrong in my judgment, it may be that my position is untenable; it may be that there is some exacting, pressing, urgent, imminent necessity why these committees should be organized to-day; but my desire has been and my purpose has been to consent to no action on the part of the Senate that would not preserve and maintain fully the equilibrium between the two parties; that is to say, if there were inevitable vacancies, unavoidable vacancies on this side of the Chamber, they should be met by a withdrawal of a similar number from that unless the present majority were willing that action should be postponed until the seats on this side were filled.

I therefore can only say for myself, without the authority or right to speak for any other member of the body, that it is not my desire, or my purpose, nor shall I willingly consent to action upon this resolution until either the Senate is filled by the presence of those appointed or elected to fill the vacancies or unless there is a withdrawal that will preserve the equilibrium between the two parties.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I think I understand sufficiently the statement made by the Senator from Kansas. I think that the statement which he has made has been supported and sustained and justified by the action of a Senator who is in my eye now and who has several times moved to adjourn and to go into executive session. I am unwilling that this contest shall degenerate into a struggle of physical endurance, and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. PENDLETON. I withdraw it if the Senator from Indiana will renew it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I will make the motion myself after I make a statement. I have taken no part in this controversy, nor do I seek to do so; but there is an assumption on the other side of the Chamber of an attitude before the country which I think is unwarranted by the facts. It is as well known to Senators on this floor as any other fact is that for a considerable time after we were called here in special session the republican side of this Chamber did not themselves know whether they intended to strive for the organization or not. We were called in executive session last Friday a week ago. I know the fact and I speak for myself when I say we hesitated and lingered and doubted over the subject and desired to obtain information from the other side of the Chamber as to their purposes. The best that we could learn was that there was entire doubt whether they had strength enough to organize. We took no steps until the forepart of last week, and then we took them slowly, communicating every step to somebody authorized to speak for the opposite side of the Chamber, and instead of there having been any haste manifested on our part by reason of vacant seats the very reverse is true to my certain positive knowledge. All the information we could obtain when we sought it through the chairman of our organization at last was that it was not proposed to do anything on that side of the Chamber. The result was proceeding slowly without any haste or desire of haste. These committees were only reported on Thursday of last week, nearly one week after we were called together here in executive session.

There has been too much said about an eager and hungry desire to grab at small offices while seats are vacant here to warrant me in keeping silent and refraining from making this statement.

We sought to know the purpose of what had been the minority, we sought to know whether they themselves understood that they were to be a majority or not, and I undertake to say, without any authority to speak for that side of the Chamber, that it was not apprised on that subject much better than we were until a very short period ago. There has been no haste, and the attempt to make the impression before the country that we were seeking to grasp the offices while one chair was draped in crape, made vacant by death, and other seats made vacant by the incoming administration and by our own action here, is utterly unwarranted.

I undertake to say—and I appeal to the country on the question—the democratic side of this Chamber have met the exigencies of a new and incoming administration with more generosity than its own followers on that side. We met it promptly, kindly, in return for which we are stigmatized as "Bourbon democrats." Compare your own conduct with ours under similar circumstances. When was there waiting for Senators to come when the exigencies of party were upon that side of the Chamber? I well remember when a seat was made vacant by the death of Mr. Guthrie, of Kentucky, when party wrath was at a white heat, hunting down the President of the United States under threats of impeachment; there was no waiting for a Senator to come then; there was no standing still at that time, none whatever; but we have not imitated the bad example of that side. I, for one, say here, I want the majority to fill these offices; I would scorn to have one of them unless the majority of the Senate sustained me. I have not known till to-day—I do not believe there is a single Senator on this side who knew until to-day—how the balance of power was to be adjusted in this body. I doubt if there were a dozen Senators on that side who knew it forty-eight hours ago. I might say, if I was not committing a breach of propriety, that the best and most honorable gentlemen on that side of the Chamber have told me so within the last forty-eight hours; so that it is unjust to the democratic Senators to assume before the country, as has been done this afternoon with great elaboration and force and beauty of rhetoric by the distinguished Senator from New York, that we were doing something or striving to do something that we ought not to do.

Mr. President, I thought it due to myself and due to this side of the Chamber to say this much. We have been placed in extraordinary circumstances, circumstances that have no parallel, I believe, in the history of the Senate. So equal a division of parties, with somebody holding the balance of power between the parties, and that somebody obscuring or having his position obscured until the last moment, is something unparalleled in the history of the country, and does not warrant the accusations that have been made that we have sought to take advantage of the vacancies on that side of the Chamber. I am ready, for one, if the Senate desires to vote, to refrain from voting, and doubtless there is another on this side of the Chamber who will do it, and have an even vote. I want to do it according to the counsels of my friends; I am ready in one moment to do it. I would not delay the organization at all. I have not sought to obstruct the movements of the Government under this new administration, and I think the Senator from New York would like to recall the animadversions which he made on this side of the Chamber, that perchance we made vacancies and hurried to do so by confirming three senatorial seats, because then we were going to take something in return.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator from Indiana understand me to say or intimate that?

Mr. VOORHEES. I understood the Senator to say it in better language than I have said it. I understood the Senator to say that he trusted he was not dealing with gift-bearing Greeks, that when this side of the Senate acted so promptly in confirming the nominations to the Cabinet that were made from this body, thereby making seats vacant, he hoped we were not doing it for the purpose of getting something in return. That is what I understood him to say, and I think the Senate understood him so.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, if he listened as well as he speaks, if as a listener he was as great as he is as an orator, he never would have fallen into that impression. I was having at the moment some rather light and perhaps jocose parley with the honorable Senator from Ohio and speaking to that Senator I said that lest he should make a defense against some other accusation that I never made and never thought of, I would stop to assure him that it did not occur to me and that I did not mean to insinuate that the democratic members of the Senate by confirming other Senators to Cabinet places, and thereby creating vacancies, intended to avail themselves of those vacancies. I referred to it jocosely, only to disclaim, to > Make assurance double sure,

> And take a bond of fate—

that the diligent ingenuity of the Senator from Ohio should not conjure up something else that I never had thought about and proceed to defend himself against that; that is all; and I assure the Senator from Indiana that I never thought of making such an insinuation.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not understand the Senator from New York to make the accusation in any temper or any unkindly spirit, but sometimes the great facility that the Senator has for the use of language leads me to read his meaning in an inverted form. Possibly I may have done him injustice in doing so at this time.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that no such scene as that we have witnessed here this afternoon will ever occur again, and consequently I want this question of organization disposed of in the quickest and smoothest manner possible. It does not become me to criticise the conduct of the Senate of the United States. It is true I have been in public life about twenty years, and I never witnessed anything like that which occurred here this afternoon, and the sooner we put this question of organization behind us and go on with the business that is before us, get through with it, adjourn, and go home, the better it will be for us in the estimation of the country and, indeed, in our own estimation. I am ready to act in any way that will best promote a solution of this question. I believe and I think there is no question but what that side of the Chamber can organize the Senate. I am perfectly willing to approach the subject at once and test that matter in the way prescribed by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I renew the motion——

Mr. VOORHEES. I promised to renew the motion of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENDLETON. No; to adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 15, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

MANIFESTATIONS OF APPLAUSE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to announce to those in the galleries, before proceeding to the business of the day, that manifestations of approval or disapproval, or of any kind, are not only in violation of the rules of the Senate but an insult to the body; and the Chair upon such demonstrations being made will order the galleries to be cleared by the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Chair hopes that those who are entitled to the privileges of the floor, and are here on the floor, will not contribute to such disorder in any manner, for their example is apt to be immediately followed by the galleries, as was the case yesterday. In such case the Chair will enforce order on the floor as well as in the galleries. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to correct the Journal. I am not recorded as voting on the last motion to adjourn. I was present and gave my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. CONGER. I voted in the affirmative.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's name will be recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was the Senator from Michigan present yesterday, and did he vote?

Mr. CONGER. I was present and gave my vote, as I did on the motion immediately preceding, upon which I am recorded.

The Journal was approved.

DEPUTY MARSHALS AT INDIANA ELECTION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to call up for consideration the resolution submitted by me yesterday on the question of the employment of United States marshals at the Indiana election.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to communicate to the Senate the names of the deputy United States marshals appointed in the State of Indiana to attend the polls at the October election for the year 1880, in said State, together with the respective localities where such deputy marshals were placed on duty, and also the names of such general deputies as were appointed with reference to said election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by adding these words:

And that he report also any information in his possession bearing upon the question of the necessity for the employment of such marshals or deputies.

To which I presume there will be no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not the slightest objection. Let the amendment be reported at the desk.

The amendment was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana accept the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call for the regular order. The regular order, I suppose, is the resolution which was under consideration yesterday.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call up the resolution which I had the honor to offer to the Senate several days ago.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Hale,	McDill,	Saunders,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hawley.	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Teller,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of N. Y.,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

NAYS—36.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Garland,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Butler,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Camden,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.

ABSENT—4.

Conkling,	Fair,	Miller,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENDLETON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR's name was called.) I wish to state that my colleague, [Mr. HOAR,] who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] Were he present I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McDill,	Saunders,
Blair,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Teller,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck.
Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of New York,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

NAYS—37.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Butler,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—3.

Cockrell,	Hoar,	Miller.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senator from Ohio will suspend the motion for one moment that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

POTOMAC RIVER FRONT.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the condition of the Potomac River front of the city of Washington and of the navigability of said river, the effect of bridges across the same upon navigation, floods, and the health of the city, and report at the next session of the Senate what steps, if any, ought in its opinion to be taken in reference thereto; that said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, and, if necessary, to employ a stenographer.

Mr. RANSOM. If there is no objection to the present consideration of the resolution that I have offered——

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. RANSOM. All right. Let the resolution be printed and lie on the table until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to have an order made?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That George Clendenin have leave to withdraw the papers in his claim from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now I renew the motion of the Senator from Ohio to adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is very apparent that we cannot reach a vote to-day upon the pending business, and it is therefore that I renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and thirty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] providing for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to offer a resolution?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion for that purpose only.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MEXICO.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not incompatible with the public interest) the correspondence and accompanying documents between the Governments of the United States and Mexico, during the years 1859 to 1861, inclusive, in regard to a proposed treaty between said governments; and that, under like limitation, he be requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence during said years between the State Department of the United States and the United States minister at Mexico, in relation to any proposed convention and treaty between the two governments.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know that I have any objection to the resolution, but I should like to be advised what the particular point is upon which the Senator from Missouri desires the information, if he is not unwilling to communicate it to the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to stating it. All the correspondence in relation to the negotiation of treaties with the Government of Mexico has been published with the exception of that referred to in this resolution. The merchants and business men of Saint Louis, in my State, take a great interest in the treaties, and at their request I have offered the resolution, requesting the President to furnish the information, if not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not quite understand the purpose of the resolution. There was a treaty made with Mexico in 1861, another in 1868, another in 1871, and another, I think, in 1874. If the effect of the resolution is to throw light upon any treaty, I suppose it would be the treaty of 1861, the extradition treaty. If there can be anything obtained by the resolution, I shall be glad to have it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, and the question is on its adoption.

The resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I only gave way temporarily.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is the Senator in such a hurry as not to allow a resolution to be offered?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I knew the Senator would permit me to offer a resolution. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds take into consideration the subject of public buildings in the city of Washington looking to the present and future needs of the General Government. Said committee shall consider a general plan and all questions relating to present and future need for public buildings, including the cost and localitions therefor, and shall make report to the next regular session of Congress. Said committee shall also report the number and location of the buildings now rented by the Government in the District of Columbia, the amount paid for rent of each building, the condition of same, and whether adapted to the purposes for which used, with their view as to the economy and propriety of continuing to rent the same. The committee may sit during the recess, request the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds and other officers of the Government to aid them; send for persons and papers, and employ a stenographer, who shall also act as clerk; and the necessary expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

I ask that the resolution be printed and lie on the table until such time as the committees shall have been appointed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me to inquire, I should like to know at this time the necessity for any such special investigation? The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have ample opportunities to find out and ascertain every fact proposed to be ascertained by the resolution without any such special appointment and authority as is contained in the resolution. I do not see the use of multiplying committees and authorizing them to make investigations which can be accomplished by the regular committees at any time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will notice that I have not asked action on the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) I am authorized on this question to pair the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] both of whom are absent on account of sickness.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Hale,	Logan,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins,
Blair,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,	Teller,
Conger,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,	Van Wyck.

NAYS—35.

Bayard,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,

Brown,	Garland,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Butler,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Camden,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vest,
Coke,	Grover,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Morgan,

ABSENT—11.

Cockrell,	Edmunds,	Mahone,	Vance,
Conkling,	Ferry,	Mitchell,	Walker.
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. VANCE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is detained at home by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr EDMUNDS.] If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Hale,	McDill,	Plumb,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sewell,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Sherman,

Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Morgan,

ABSENT—8.

Edmunds,	Gorman,	Vance,	Voorhees,
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck,	Walker.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now move that the Senate adjourn until Friday.

Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 33, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Allison,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Hale,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Blair,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Teller.

Davis of Illinois,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Williams.

ABSENT—5.

Edmunds,	Sherman,	Vance,	Walker.
Jones of Nevada,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is very well known to every Senator present that we can have no legislative business to-day, but there are appointments on the table which have been sent here by the President that deserve consideration, and prompt consideration, and therefore I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FARLEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. FARLEY. As I understand, a number of appointments have been sent in by the President; and while we are in no condition to consider appointments in executive session, there seems to be a disposition on the part of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to do no business whatever. I apprehend that we had just as well adjourn sine die as to continue here twelve or fifteen days without considering any of the business that has been sent to us to be considered. The Senators on that side of the Chamber seem disposed to delay the business of the Senate, and it is well enough that the people of the country at least should understand that business is delayed and why it is so delayed. We have been here for thirteen days, including to-day——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him to make an inquiry?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator inform the country on whose motion the Senate adjourned yesterday at half past twelve?

Mr. FARLEY. I believe the RECORD will show the fact that after a number of dilatory motions made on that side of the Chamber to adjourn to a day certain, to adjourn immediately, and to go into executive session, when it became apparent that they were not disposed to do any business on that side whatever, then it was moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Executive business is all we can do. A motion has just been made to go into executive session, and our distinguished friends on the other side all voted against it.

Mr. FARLEY. What could we do in executive session?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I think I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. FARLEY. I think it would be entirely proper——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to know by what authority——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have the floor, I believe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That is business as important as any other that can be brought before the Senate. When the gentleman says that these motions are made for dilatory purposes he makes a mistake——

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order. The question is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when the name of Mr. VANCE was called.) I have already stated to-day that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired on these questions with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Allison,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Conkling,	Logan,	Plumb,
Dawes,	McDill,	Rollins,

NAYS—37.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Groome,	McPherson,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Williams.
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,

ABSENT—4.

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Kellogg,	Vance.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not propose to discuss the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] but I heard a remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] which implies that by reason of a motion having been made by the Senator from Ohio yesterday to adjourn the democratic side of this Chamber is responsible for nothing being done. That remark was very unjust; and it was known by the Senator from Massachusetts at the time that it was a very unjust imputation against the democrats in this Chamber. He knew full well that the democrats had for several days been trying to organize the Senate so as to proceed with public business, and he knew that they had been thwarted in their purpose by dilatory motions emanating from his own side of the Chamber.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who seems now so anxious to go into executive session in order to transact the public business, ought to remember, because the time has not been far past when he, in connection with others upon his side of the Chamber, became an obstructionist to the public business. He knows full well that toward the close of the last Congress, while this side of the Chamber was trying to proceed to the confirmation of nominations sent here by the late Executive, he and others upon that side of the Chamber sat still in their seats and refused to vote, and refused to permit us to proceed with the public business and to confirm the nominations which had been sent here by a republican President.

It is perhaps well that the man who was elevated without right to the Presidency should have been defeated in this Chamber and his administration broken down in this Chamber by the very men who elevated him without right to the Presidency. There may have been a species of poetic justice in the fact that the men who in the inception of the administration had without just right elevated him to the Presidency should in the closing hours of his administration break it down and humble it before the whole country. But that is the history of the last session of the Senate. For weeks we were hardly able to get an executive session, and there were numerous nominations sent here by the President that fell because of the obstruction made by the other side of the Chamber.

Therefore, it ill becomes the Senator from Massachusetts to rise here and propound the question, Who moved an adjournment yesterday? The country has taken note of these proceedings. The country knows full well that if the republican side of this Chamber at the last session had performed its duty according to the expectation of the country and proceeded to the consideration of the nominations sent here by the late President, perhaps this extra session would not have lasted three days. A large portion of the work, as I understand, which has already been done is to renominate the men whose nominations fell with the expiration of the last Congress.

Consequently the blame does not attach to this side of the Chamber, it belongs to the other side of the Chamber. They have impeded the public business, and it ill becomes the Senator from Massachusetts to attack the democracy and charge us with delaying the public business on account of a motion made by the Senator from Ohio yesterday to adjourn after it had been demonstrated, by motions made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the purpose of that side of the House was to interpose dilatory motions and prevent proceeding with the public business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the gentleman? My motion yesterday was to go into executive session in order to transact the business that is before us and which ought to be transacted. It was not a dilatory motion. My motion to-day was to go into executive session, and I beg the Senator if he wants to work——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does not the Senator know——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Permit me, please, to finish my sentence.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir, I will allow the Senator to finish his sentence.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I want to work just as much as you want to work. The republican side of this House wants to work just as much as your side of the House wants to work.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Without committees?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask you to go into executive session and let us do the work which is before us.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows full well that the very first motion he made to-day was to adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Simply because the Senate refused to go into executive session yesterday.

Mr. SAULSBURY. How does the Senator from Pennsylvania expect to convince the country that he is sincere in the declaration that he desires to proceed with the public business, when he came into the Chamber this morning and, as soon as the Journal was read, moved an adjournment of the body? How are we going to do business without committees? The Senator from Pennsylvania knows that the practice of this body is to refer nominations to committees and have them reported back from committees before we take them up for consideration, except in the exceptional cases where men have been nominated who have been members of this body.

Sir, the people of this country understand all this. It is futile for the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Massachusetts to try to impose upon the fifty million people of this country the idea that they are anxious to proceed with the public business, and that the delay is due to the democratic side of the Chamber.

Mr. GROOME. In order that my friend from Pennsylvania may be in a situation to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, I call up the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio the other day, and I assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that the very moment it is adopted and the committees are appointed by this body, so that we can decently and in order go into executive session and attend to executive business, he shall be gratified by having an executive session. I call up the resolution, and the very moment the resolution is adopted we will go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to the Senator from Delaware attempting the arduous task of defending that side of the Chamber from the imputation or suspicion of delay, but I do object to his undertaking to say that I knew what I said to be unjust to that side of the Chamber. I not only do not know any such thing, but if I had any doubt about it I should have been convinced that I was right by the remarks which the Senator from Delaware has just made. The Senator from Delaware has fallen upon the task of defending the course of his side of the Chamber in the last Congress. That is past, and past all hope, too. It is not necessary to refer to that; it throws no light upon the question why it is that that side of the Chamber, holding at this moment an accidental majority, refuses to proceed to the business for which this session was called, and to proceed to any other business but that of filling certain offices in the Senate, which cannot be filled permanently until the Senate, being full, shall determine for itself. There is upon the table an executive message, which the Senator from Delaware, who undertakes to vindicate his side of the Chamber against a disposition to delay, refuses to go into executive session to have opened and learn what it is. There is no occasion for a committee of this body to be appointed to ascertain what there is in a sealed executive message submitted to this body this morning. We can proceed with all the business for which we were called here if we are disposed to do it; but if gentlemen have any other thing in mind of as much importance as who shall occupy a few offices in the Senate, to those who seem to think that that is paramount to all public business of any kind, it is very natural that they should insist upon throwing aside all public business until they can proceed to the filling of places that are unnecessary for the transaction of the business, and to fill them, too, before the Senate shall be full and before the body shall determine in full Senate how they shall be filled.

I care not, Mr. President, how they are filled, only that they be filled by the Senate, and so filled as to represent what a majority of the Senate shall determine. If it shall fall upon one side or the other side of the line, let it so fall that it will remain permanent, that we shall not exhibit to the country a greater anxiety to scramble for the possession of a few unimportant and troublesome offices, forgetting the business for which we are called here and the dispatch of which is interrupted solely for this purpose.

The Senator from Delaware need not trouble himself about whether the country will understand this or not. The Senator from Delaware looks back upon how the Senate of the past day acted when there was a majority on that side of nine or ten and that majority could have commanded the Senate for the dispatch of any business at any hour it pleased. The Senator from Delaware is in a queer position, arraigning the helpless minority in the last Senate on this side because the majority on that side, who commanded the business of the country, omitted to exercise the power and take the responsibility that belonged to the majority.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word, and that is that it is apparent and has been for the last three or four days that we are not to be allowed to organize the Senate or to organize the committees of the Senate until such time as suits the gentlemen who are now in the minority and who may be in the majority very soon. I think the country understands, as the Senate understands, what is meant; and all the skirmishing now going on as to who shall move to adjourn and who shall not move to adjourn, does not deceive anybody. The Senator from Pennsylvania, with his usual courage, avows, I think, that he intends to have everybody here before any vote is taken.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. BECK. I know you do, and I admire the courage of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and we recognize the fact that we cannot compel you to act until that time comes. I am one of those who believe that when a republican President was elected and a republican House of Representatives at his back, it is better for the party that I have the honor in part to represent on this floor that he should have the Senate at his back as well, and take the responsibility of whatever legislation is had, take the credit of all that is good and the responsibility of all that is bad. Therefore I am not seeking any temporary advantage to hold on to a few committees or a few other privileges that might be very well as a mere matter of personal convenience; but I am willing to meet the issue fairly, and as we have postponed it so long, knowing that the majority will be on the other side in all probability in a day or two, we may just as well consent to an adjournment and await that time.

The incoming Senator from Maine has been elected; both houses voted for him yesterday, and the election will be confirmed in joint session to-day. The telegraph will tell us perhaps in an hour, or less, that that is the fact. The new Senator from Minnesota will be here to-morrow. Then, whatever there may be in the confession of the fact, if the Senator from Ohio will authorize me to do it, or consent to it, I will move to adjourn. [Mr. PENDLETON nodded assent.] I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. Will not the Senator from Kentucky move to adjourn until Friday?

Mr. BECK. No, I cannot get the consent of many gentlemen to do that; but perhaps to-morrow we shall be ready for something.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 17, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I have received information which induces me to suppose that it is impossible to get a vote to-day upon the pending measure. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment or two, that I may present the credentials of my colleague.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the credentials of Alonzo J. Edgerton, appointed by the governor of the State of Minnesota a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the resignation of William Windom.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 2, 1862, having been administered to Mr. EDGERTON, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 18, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HALE presented the credentials of William P. Frye, elected by the Legislature of Maine a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of James G. Blaine, for the term ending March 3, 1883.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 2, 1862, having been administered to Mr. FRYE, he took his seat in the Senate.

CAPITULATIONS OF OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, a copy of the report made to the Secretary of State by Edward A. Van Dyck, consular clerk at Cairo, on the capitulations of the Ottoman Empire, with the several appendixes thereto.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the clerks of the committees of the Senate who held such positions on the 4th day of March, 1881, and who do not receive annual salaries, the usual per diem compensation from the 4th day of March to the 18th day of March, 1881, inclusive.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the resolution. I will explain the purpose of it. In the deficiency appropriation act, on page 11, as printed, is the following:

For twenty-two clerks to committees, * * * a sum sufficient to pay them during the special session of the Senate.

Upon an application to the proper officer of the Treasury Department for pay, that officer has construed this clause that there being no committees there were no clerks after the 4th of March; and therefore they do not get the benefit of this appropriation. This resolution is simply by the action of the Senate to recognize them as clerks, in fact to make them clerks, that they may get the benefit of this appropriation from the 5th of March to the 18th of March, inclusive. It is simply making effective that which we attempted to do by the appropriation which I have just read. I think there can be no objection to it, and I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. There is some confusion in the Chamber, and I did not hear distinctly what the Senator from Arkansas said on the resolution. I should like to hear it read again before unanimous consent is granted for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution the second time at length.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the honorable Senator would restate what he said. We lost his statement on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. GARLAND. In the general deficiency appropriation act, on page 11, as printed, we have the following item:

For twenty-two clerks to committees, * * * a sum sufficient to pay them during the special session of the Senate.

Upon an application for pay under this appropriation, the Comptroller has held that, there being no committees, there were no clerks; and he has declined to recognize the right of these parties to pay. They have done the work; they have been continued in service; and the resolution is simply to recognize them as clerks for this length of time, to make them clerks in fact, that they may get the benefit of the appropriation made in the general deficiency appropriation bill from the 5th of March to the 18th, which is to-day, inclusive. That is all there is of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Were not all clerks who were not on the annual list allowed thirty days' additional compensation from the 4th of March, either by a resolution of the Senate or by joint action of the two Houses?

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that all the officers of the Senate were allowed the same.

Mr. INGALLS. So that they have already been paid thirty days from the 4th of March, and this resolution proposes to pay them for twelve or fourteen days more?

Mr. ALLISON. I think the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas should pass. The appropriation was made for these clerks in the deficiency bill. It has always been the custom to pay them during called executive sessions; and this is only to correct an error in the phraseology of the original law passed to give them pay.

Mr. MORRILL. It strikes me that the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right. I do not understand that by any possibility these clerks can get double pay. They have really been in service up to the present time, and therefore ought to receive the usual compensation. I do not understand, either, that there will be any necessity for a resolution after the committees have been formed. If that be so, it strikes me that the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right; and I hope it will pass without objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This resolution is in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read the third time at length.

The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call up the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio calls up the unfinished business of the Senate, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on the 10th instant, for the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate, which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that there is no necessity for reading the whole list unless some Senator desires it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further reading of the resolution will be dispensed with.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that this resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PENDLETON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire is this the resolution proposing on the other side the organization of the committees?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. And the Senator from Rhode Island moves to postpone it in order that he may move another resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not desire to take possession of any matter the Senator from Rhode Island has in view, but I am exceedingly anxious that we should get to work and do something here. Let me make the suggestion to him that the shortest way would be to propose whatever committees the other side desire as a substitute.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, and others. No.

Mr. GARLAND. Of course I have no particular desire about it. I want to get at business in the shortest possible way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the first resolution of the Senator from Ohio was that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees, and that subsequently he offered a resolution appointing the standing committees. Therefore if this resolution is indefinitely postponed, another resolution proposing a different list will be in order under the original resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] Were he here, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. EDMUNDS's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired for to-day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.] The pair of my colleague with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] has been exchanged to-day for this purpose.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MAHONE, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted under a misapprehension. I thought I was voting on the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas in reference to the pay of the clerks of committees; but I understand it is on postponing indefinitely the resolution in reference to the formation of the committees of the Senate. I therefore beg leave to change my vote, and vote "yea."

The result of the roll-call was as follows:

YEAS—37.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Frye,	McDill,	Saunders,
Blair,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of N. Y.,
Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

NAYS—37.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Butler,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—2.

Camden, Edmunds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, to postpone indefinitely the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, the yeas are 37, and the nays are 37. The Senate being equally divided, the Chair votes "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not rise to interpose any objection to the vote of the Vice-President, but I rise to express my opinion——

Mr. HOAR. I submit that nothing is in order until the vote is declared.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Clerk will declare the vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to hear what the Senator from Delaware has to say.

The SECRETARY. The yeas are 38, and the nays are 37.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas being 38 and the nays 37, the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is agreed to; and the resolution of the Senator from Ohio is indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rose before the final announcement of the vote to say that while I do not propose to interpose an objection to the vote of the Vice-President in determining a question of this character, I desire to express my own opinion that, in the organization of the Senate and the organization of its committees, the Vice-President of the United States is not clothed by the Constitution of the country with the power to decide a question of that character. That is my deliberate judgment. Without entering into any argument, I simply wish to make here and now a declaration of my own opinion that it is an assumption of power on the part of the Vice-President unwarranted by the Constitution of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not suppose that any Senator would question the right of the Vice-President to give the casting vote on any legislative act, or any other act, where the Senate is a tie; and in order that the country may understand thoroughly that the Vice-President has followed the precedents, and not only the precedents, but the Constitution of the United States, I desire to read from a very ancient record in reference to casting the vote——

Mr. FARLEY. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I simply suggest to him that there is no question before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that; but I desire, in response to the Senator from Delaware, to show the correctness of the vote of the Vice-President. On the 15th of December, 1829, we find the following record——

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to ask what question is before the Senate at this time?

Mr. LOGAN. I beg to say to the Senator that I am proceeding to read a paragraph from a Senate Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is no question before the Senate at this time.

Mr. LOGAN. There is none, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that this debate goes on by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the honorable Senator from Illinois that, evenly divided as the Senate finds itself, he will have ample opportunity, when it is practical and in order, to read whatever he desires to read in the form of precedents and constitutional provision. It is a question with which we shall all become very familiar necessarily in the present condition of the Senate. Hence I would greatly prefer proceeding to the legitimate business of the day.

Mr. LOGAN. I should have been through long ago if the eloquent Senator from Tennessee had only contented himself in patience. I will read this extract if there be no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. LOGAN. On the election of Chaplain——

Mr. BAYARD. What is the authority?

Mr. LOGAN. I read from the Journal of the Senate of December 15, 1829:

> The Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part; and the whole number of ballots collected was 42, of which the Reverend Henry Van Dyke Johns had 21, and the Reverend John P. Durbin had 21; the vote of the Vice-President was then taken, which decided the election in favor of the Reverend Henry Van Dyke Johns.

Mr. CONKLING. Who was the Vice-President?

Mr. LOGAN. The Vice-President was John C. Calhoun.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that Rule 47 be amended so as to read: "A Committee on Finance, to consist of eleven Senators."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, that we proceed to the election of standing committees, I move that the following be the standing committees of the Senate; I send the list to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the list, as follows:

STANDING COMMITTEES.

On Privileges and Elections—Messrs. Hoar, (chairman,) Cameron of Wisconsin, Teller, Sherman, Frye, Saulsbury, Hill of Georgia, Vance, and Pugh.

To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Jones of Nevada, (chairman,) Platt of Connecticut, and Vance.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Saulsbury, (chairman,) Call, and Conkling.

On Rules—Messrs. Frye, (chairman,) Hoar, Sherman, Call, and Gorman.

On the Improvements of the Mississippi River and Tributaries—Messrs Mitchell, (chairman,) Kellogg, Van Wyck, Frye, Jonas, Cockrell, and Jackson.

On Transportation Routes to the Seaboard—Messrs. Harrison, (chairman,) Cameron of Pennsylvania, Blair, Platt of New York, Beck, Voorhees, and Camden.

Joint Committee on Public Printing—Messrs. Anthony, (chairman,) Hawley, and Gorman.

Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Platt of New York, (chairman,) Rollins, and Pugh.

Joint Committee on the Library—Messrs. Sherman, (chairman,) Hoar, and Voorhees.

Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—Messrs. Rollins, (chairman,) Morrill, Cameron of Wisconsin, Jones of Florida, and Vest.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire if that list is accompanied by a resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the Clerk to read any such resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I stated the resolution; it is not in writing. The Clerk will reduce it to writing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. PENDLETON. On the adoption of the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—37.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,

ABSENT—2.

Camden, Edmunds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island the yeas are 37 and the nays are 37. The Senate being equally divided, the Chair votes in the affirmative; and so the yeas are 38 and the nays are 37, and the resolution is passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following select committees be appointed for the present session, and that each committee thus created be vested with all the powers and authorities heretofore given to each of the select committees on the respective subjects to which they relate:

SELECT COMMITTEES.

To examine the several branches of the Civil Service—Messrs. Sawyer, (chairman,) Rollins, Dawes, Hampton, and Groome.

To make provision for taking the Tenth Census and ascertaining the results thereof—Messrs. Hale, (chairman,) Morrill, Cameron of Wisconsin, McDill, Pendleton, Morgan, and Harris.

To investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of Epidemic Diseases—Messrs. Harris, (chairman,) Lamar, Garland, Jonas, Teller, Miller, and Sewell.

To inquire into all Claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua—Messrs. Davis of West Virginia, (chairman,) Groome, Johnston, Hawley, and Mitchell.

JOINT SELECT COMMITTEE.

On additional accommodations for the Library of Congress—Messrs. Voorhees, (chairman,) Butler, and Morrill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator that there is no politics in this resolution. There are, I think, more democrats than republicans assigned as chairmen of these committees.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator care about the yeas and nays?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator presenting the resolution to explain to the Senate the necessity for the Nicaraguan Claims Committee. I think it is very likely that upon investigation by the Senate it would be found that there are a dozen committees that might be very well dispensed with. I should like for the Senator to explain the necessity for that committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee was ordered by the Senate upon what was deemed sufficient evidence, and it has not finally reported. This is a mere continuation of the committee ordered at the last Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. VOORHEES. The call for the yeas and nays, I understand, has been withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CONKLING. We do not hear the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I stated that I understood the Senator from Ohio to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir, I did not.

Mr. VOORHEES. I misunderstood it, then.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but I rise to call attention to the difference of action between this side of the Chamber and the other side of the Chamber in reference to the organization of the Senate. We were convened in executive session on the 4th of March by a republican President, and communications were sent to the Senate requiring our action upon important matters. This side of the Chamber, then having a majority of the body, proposed to put the Senate in such a position that it could proceed with the public business of the country. For fourteen days, from the 4th of March until the present time, we have been delayed and hindered, and now, as soon as it has become manifest that the other side of this Chamber has secured a majority of the votes of the members of the Senate, whatsoever means they may have resorted to in order to secure that result, the democratic side of this Chamber, acting in good faith to the country, declines to enter into any obstructive measures to prevent the organization, though they might have done so in imitation of the example set by the other side.

I call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the proud position which the democratic party occupies in this regard before the whole country, in striking contrast with the action of the other side, which for nearly one-half of a month has obstructed the public business in order that they might put themselves in a position to seize upon the organization of the Senate.

I simply rose to emphasize the position of the two parties now, so that the country might take note of it, nothing more, not to oppose the adoption of the resolution. I shall record my vote against it for reasons which it is unnecessary now to explain; but our party presents the proud position of not following the example set to us by the other side and making obstruction to the public business of the country.

Mr. GARLAND. Under the call for the yeas and nays on the resolution I shall have to ask for a division of the question. I find recorded in this list a committee with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] as chairman, that we had raised under a resolution several years ago, and one recorded with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] as chairman, and one with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] at its head. I cannot vote against these committees. They have been accorded to this side. If we come to a yea-and-nay vote and take it as a whole, I shall be compelled to vote for this resolution. Therefore I must ask for a division of the question as the yeas and nays are called, and take a separate vote on each committee, which, under the thirty-first rule, I have a right to do.

Mr. PENDLETON. In order to relieve my friend from Arkansas from the dilemma in which he would feel placed, I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The call for the yeas any nays is withdrawn.

Mr. JONAS. I desire to record my vote on this question, and I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Arkansas indulge me in understanding him, as I always wish to follow that honorable Senator whenever I can? Shall I understand that he wishes to vote for as many of these committees as are democratic in their organization and for none of the others? I did not hear all that the Senator said, and if the honorable Senator will gratify me I should feel instructed if I could know his position on that point.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state my position. Conceding that the republican side of the Senate have the control of the committees, they awarded this side the chairmanship of three committees, for which as one I was disposed to be thankful, as I am always for even a small favor; and I did not intend to put myself in opposition to that favor which was awarded to this side. Really and in truth my opinion is that this resolution had better be adopted as it is, since the list of standing committees has been adopted by a vote of the Senate; but I could not be so ungrateful to the other side as to put myself in the attitude of voting against the three committees that they have accorded to this side. That is the response which I make to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JONAS. As I feel grateful for nothing, as I feel that nothing has been awarded by the other side, as I feel that the appointment of these committees is made by a partisan majority obtained by questionable means, as these committees have been framed in a republican caucus after the majority of the Senate were prevented for two weeks from making committees, as these committees are now enforced upon us by the vote of the presiding officer in a divided Senate, and enforced upon us by the vote of a Senator from a democratic State, who was, as many of us believe, elected as a democrat—as I said before, I think that we have nothing to be grateful for; and as I am disposed to accept nothing as accorded, I desire to place my vote upon record as opposed to the construction of these committees as well as of those which have been adopted by the previous resolution, and I ask for a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. The objection which the Senator from Arkansas makes to the select committees applies equally to the standing committees upon which he voted. There are democratic chairmen of three standing committees.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I simply desire to say for one that regarding the other side as having the right, under the circumstances, to propose these committees, I cannot object to them upon the ground that there is any illiberality in them. I think that the committees as they have been proposed by both sides are liberal and just enough. I am not voting "nay" on the adoption of the resolution because I am for or against the particular distribution of individuals in the committees. That is not the point with me at all. The point with me is, to use the language of a distinguished gentleman, that I believe the proper constitutional majority in this body is on this side of the House, and it ought to have the right to propose the committees.

Mr. CONKLING. It is on that side of the House, the Senator thinks; but in fact the votes are on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes; the constitutional majority is on this side and the actual majority is on that, including the Vice-President. I desire simply to say, too, that I do not concur with my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in the view that the Vice-President in this case has a right to vote. I think he has not; but I do not make the point on this question. I think that the committees proposed by this side, when we thought we had the right to propose them, it will be agreed by every one on that side were fair and liberal; and I think the committees as proposed by that side, who now think they have a right to propose the committees, are fair and liberal, and I do not vote yea or nay on the question because of any liberality or illiberality in the composition of the committees; it is simply upon the other question, and therefore I shall vote "nay" if the yeas and nays are ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks for a division of the question. How will the Senator have it divided?

Mr. GARLAND. On each committee separately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote will be taken on each committee separately.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator call attention to the rule under which he claims that this resolution can be divided?

Mr. GARLAND. In response to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that the rule is Rule 31:

If the question in debate contain several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Clerk will report the first select committee.

The CHIEF CLERK:

To examine the several branches of the Civil Service—Messrs. Sawyer, (chairman,) Rollins, Dawes, Hampton, and Groome.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND. There seems to be a desire that a division shall not be insisted on, and I withdraw my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his request for a division.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the question is on the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] for the formation of select committees. As many as are in favor of agreeing to the same will say "ay."

Mr. JONAS. I called for the yeas and nays, and the Chair announced that they were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They were ordered upon the division asked for by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONAS. I call for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 35; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNED TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 21, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR DEAF AND DUMB.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BAYARD director on the part of the Senate of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb under the provisions of section 2 of the act of July 27, 1868, making appropriations for the service of the Columbian Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes.

DEATH OF SENATOR CARPENTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which was read:

Joint resolution in respect to the memory of Senator Matthew H. Carpenter.

Whereas on yesterday the sad intelligence was received of the death of Matthew Hale Carpenter, Senator of the United States from the State of Wisconsin, out of respect for whose memory both houses of the Legislature immediately adjourned: Therefore in the name of the people of Wisconsin, it is Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) First. That, while bowing in humble submission to the will of Him who presides over nations as well as individuals, the State recognizes the loss of a distinguished and faithful Senator, and that the nation has been deprived of the services of a brilliant statesman, an able constitutional lawyer, and a true patriot.

Second. That, deeply impressed with the great services and high honor which his intellectual powers have conferred upon the nation and the State, with the memory of the warm friendships which existed between him and his intimate personal acquaintances, and the shadow of gloom which his absence must necessarily bring to the home of his widow and children, we extend to them our heartfelt sympathy and condolence and join them as mourners over the loss of the eminent departed.

Third. That a certified copy of these resolutions be sent to the presiding officer of the Senate of the United States, and also to the family of the deceased.

J. M. BINGHAM,
President of the Senate.
IRA B. BRADFORD,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN, Senate Chamber, ss:

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Charles E. Bross, chief clerk of the senate of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of joint resolution No. 29 S., A. D. 1881, has been compared by me with the original joint resolution on file in my office, and that the same is a true copy thereof and of the whole of such original joint resolution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 12th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1881.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. BROSS,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. GARLAND. I move also, as is customary, that the resolution be entered at length upon the Journal of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to nem. con.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That Augustus Boyd have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY ACCOMMODATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, receiving three readings:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress is hereby authorized to employ a clerk, who shall be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund, and to sit during the recess of Congress.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 22, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General transmitting, in compliance with Senate resolution of the 11th instant, a copy of the report of C. C. Lancaster, special agent of the Treasury Department, together with copies of all papers received by the Department of Justice in relation to the conduct and operations of the United States Marshal and his deputies, the district attorney, and the commissioners in the Western district of Virginia; which, on motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That George W. Graffam have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, in conformity with the rules.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Colonel Schuyler Hamilton.

THE NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will defer that motion for a moment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer a resolution, and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the hostile attitude assumed by the national banks toward the refunding of the national debt at a low rate of interest, and their recent attempt to dictate the legislation of Congress on that subject, are contrary to the best interests of the people and well calculated to excite their alarm for the future.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be reported again.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely rise to ask the Senator from Indiana if he does not think that that is legislative business, and whether it is proper that we should go into legislative business at this executive session?

Mr. VOORHEES. After consulting with those best informed on that subject, I supposed there would be no question about the right to offer the resolution; and by the consent of the Senate this morning or to-morrow morning I desire to submit a few remarks upon the subject of the resolution, not asking for action upon it at this time.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to the reception of the resolution as out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. That gives rise to a question that we may as well meet. Is the question of order debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Chair rules and an appeal is taken I suppose it will be debatable; but in the present attitude of it the question can hardly be debatable.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can only say that I confess I supposed there would be no question of order upon the subject at all.

Mr. FERRY. As I understand it this is a matter of legislative business. We are convened in executive session, which of course excludes all legislative business. I understand that the resolution, as I have just heard its second reading, is a proposition to enter upon legislation. The Senator from Indiana desires to submit his views upon a question of legislation, which I think is clearly out of order; and I trust the Chair will rule it out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. It may be desirable to have this subject ruled out of order at this time; but I had no idea, I wish to say to those versed in parliamentary law, that I was running in conflict with any question of order. I may be permitted to say that I have consulted upon this question with those who have served longest in this body, and I have been informed that the precedents are that even legislative acts may be passed upon in a session of this kind, left to depend for their passage finally upon the action of the other House when convened in a session further along in the same Congress. I understand the precedents to stand in that way.

I am always very frank with the Senate. I simply desire to submit a few remarks which I think would be in the interest of the people upon this question. If it is deemed desirable upon the other side of the Chamber to rule that out on a point of order, it may be done; I do not know. As the question is not debatable, I beg pardon of the Senate for trespassing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question of order to the Senate. Shall the resolution be received?

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to make a suggestion, particularly to the Senator from Indiana, if I can have his attention.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator has wish enough about this matter to pursue it, I suggest to him that he withhold the offer of his resolution until to-morrow morning, which will enable the Senator himself and enable me and those who are no better instructed about the question than I am to look at the precedents and the law on this subject. The Senator will lose nothing in that regard. If he will allow me, I will state to him my reason chiefly for that course.

Such a resolution as this, and remarks which the Senator would make upon it, must be addressed to the legislative duty and function of the Senate. The Senator from Indiana does not admit, nor do I, that in rising to speak here we are talking to somebody else. In theory, remarks made in the Senate are addressed to the Senate and for some purpose pertinent to the Senate.

If I were to say (I will not suppose the case of the Senator from Indiana) "I wish to address the Senate upon a subject which could not in any way be considered by the Senate," it would be an open admission that I was using my place in the Senate as I would use a place at the hustings, to speak to the people. That I could not mean, and that the Senator from Indiana does not mean.

I submit to the Senator that this must be addressed to the legislative power of the Senate. If it be in order for the Senator from Indiana to introduce a resolution of this kind, however meritorious it may be, and speak to it, manifestly it is the right of every other member of the Senate to introduce any resolution pertinent to the legislation or the business of the Senate in an ordinary session, and proceed to speak to it.

Therefore this question ought to be determined not in reference to this particular resolution, upon which we should all like to hear the honorable Senator from Indiana, but it must be treated in view of the fact that the law and the rule as it shall be held in regard to this matter becomes the law and the rule in regard to every other matter.

If anything that I have said shall induce the assent of the Senator from Indiana, I wish he would withhold his resolution until to-morrow morning and give us all an opportunity to look and see where this leads to.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word to the Senator from Indiana. Another Senator asked my opinion in relation to a resolution which I most cordially approved about the tariff, and I advised him that he would not have the power to introduce it upon this occasion; that it would raise a debate which could lead to no result, because if leading to any result it would be legislative business, and I thought it would be clearly out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course I shall act upon the suggestion of the Senator from New York, for it is a proper one. I can only say that convinced in my own mind upon information that this was not only in order, but that no question would be raised, I desire to look up the precedents myself.

I am informed that when the extra session of the Senate was convened of like character with this in March, 1861, there were many weeks of discussion upon Senator Douglas's resolution as to what the future policy of the Government should be. I apprehend it will be found that the precedents are all in favor of the position which I assume; but we will look into the matter and see what is proper to be done. In the mean time the resolution can lie where it is, and if the precedents are found against me, I will withdraw it; if not, I shall ask to be heard upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Indiana, if he has no choice, to just withhold the resolution as his own resolution. He speaks of allowing it to lie. An objection to its reception must be made upon the threshold. If it lies on the table the question comes too late. If the honorable Senator will simply offer his resolution in the morning, he will have every right he has now.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana withdraws the resolution.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at one o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 23, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, it was Ordered, That Joseph Hertford have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

THE NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the hostile attitude assumed by the national banks towards the refunding of the national debt at a low rate of interest, and their recent attempt to dictate the legislation of Congress on that subject, are contrary to the best interests of the people and well calculated to excite their alarm for the future.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to object to the reception of the resolution as being out of order, this being an executive session and the resolution clearly pointing to legislative business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the question of order will be submitted by the Chair to the Senate for decision.

Mr. VOORHEES. There are some things of sufficient value and importance to the Senate to justify consideration by themselves; and perhaps this question of order may be one of them. If the Chair will place the question before the Senate so that it can be properly discussed, I promise to submit the action of this body for such length of time on similar questions as I think will settle this point not only for the present but perhaps for the future. It is not debatable as it stands now. If placed in a debatable form, and if the Senate will hear me upon the question, I think I can convince every Senator present that the point of order is not well taken, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] both included; or do I understand that the Chair has ruled upon it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that in justice to the Chair it would be right for the Senate to give the Senator from Indiana the opportunity to show the precedents which within my own knowledge and time out of mind have been made in executive sessions. After the precedents are given for the benefit of the Chair, then the question of order may properly be raised. It seems to me it would be unjust to the Chair to raise the question of order and ask him to rule on it before the precedents are given. My understanding is that resolutions expressive of opinion or calling for information have been debated at every special executive session that has been called by any President of the United States since the foundation of the Government; and it seems to me the precedents should be laid before the Chair before he is called upon to decide the question of order. I hope, therefore, that by unanimous consent the Senator from Indiana will be allowed to give the precedents which bear upon the case.

Mr. FERRY. I have no desire to antagonize the Senator from Indiana. He knows our personal relations are such that I would not do that in any event; but I think it my duty to state now, as I did yesterday, that if the Senator from Indiana is permitted to discuss a question of legislative interest, it opens the door to all legislative questions whatever. We are called together here in executive session. We are not here for legislative business. If the Senator can speak upon a legislative question, then every Senator here present can also speak upon any such question.

Mr. VOORHEES. I simply desire to speak upon the question of order.

Mr. FERRY. It seems to me that the ruling of the Chair is correct, that in a session for executive business there cannot be any legislative business whatever transacted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the Chair has so ruled?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not made any ruling on the question.

Mr. MORRILL. My only purpose in making the point of order was, if possible, to shorten this session. I am anxious to adjourn at an early day. I know that the Senator from Indiana is capable of making a long argument; but he will not suppose that an argument upon one side will be left without comment upon the other; and if discussion should arise upon this question, it may very likely arise on others..

While I should be glad to hear my friend from Indiana, who I suppose is about to make some apology for the position of himself and his party, I rather think that the resolution had better not be discussed at the present time, as it will certainly give rise to a protracted debate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume that I shall have an opportunity in some shape to discuss the question of order so as to determine whether I have a right to make the remarks which I suggested upon the resolution. All I wish now is to address myself to the question of order and have the Senate settle the point whether such a resolution as I have offered is in order or out of order.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope unanimous consent will be given for that purpose. I shall not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to submit remarks which he desires——

Mr. MORRILL. On the point of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I propose only to speak on the point of order, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and then at the close of my remarks I will take the sense of the Senate whether such a resolution as I have offered is in order or out of order.

Mr. FERRY. What is the question the Senator proposes now to discuss?

Mr. VOORHEES. I propose to discuss the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont, to the effect that the resolution which I have offered should not be received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate upon the question of order. The Chair understands that upon that question debate is permissible.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is taken, I hope debate will be had. I should like to hear the precedents. I think by unanimous consent debate should be allowed to proceed on the question of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. The question being submitted to the Senate by the Chair, I presume I am entitled to proceed. However, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Ohio for his kind consideration, notwithstanding.

Mr. President, the question of order now presented to the Senate, as far as I can discover, was first distinctly made on the 5th of March, 1851, in the Thirty-second Congress. The President of the Senate at that time was William R. King, and on that day, immediately after prayer, he directed the galleries to be cleared. Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, rose and offered to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That each member of the Senate be supplied with twelve additional copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the first and second session of the Thirtieth Congress, and that the Secretary cause the same to be bound.

Upon the presentation of this resolution, it not being pretended that it pertained to executive business, the Presiding Officer announced that he could not receive any resolution or permit any business to be done until the galleries were cleared. He proceeded to say that in the course of a long experience the Chair had known no instance of business being done at such a session until the galleries had been cleared. From that decision Mr. Badger appealed, and after some struggle over his right to do so he proceeded to address the Senate upon the point. The precedents which he then cited are of great value in enabling us now to arrive at a correct conclusion. The first pointed out by him was to the effect that on the 9th of March, 1825, in a special session of the Senate, the House not having been convened, among other business done the Journal states that—

On motion, the twenty-fifth rule, requiring one day's notice to be given of an intended motion to bring in a resolution to grant money out of the contingent fund, being unanimously dispensed with, Mr. Seymour submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to allow and pay, out of the contingent fund, to Tobias Simpson, $120 for the use of a horse furnished by him in the performance of his duties as a messenger."

The said resolution was read, and, by unanimous consent, considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent and passed.

Again, from the Journal of the 9th of March, 1829, Mr. Badger cited the following action of the Senate in special session:

On motion by Mr. Kane,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed, in pursuance of the thirty-third rule, to audit and control the contingent expenses of the Senate.

It was agreed that the Vice-President appoint the committee; and Messrs. Kane, Hendricks, and Chambers were appointed, accordingly.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. Benton asked and obtained leave to bring in the following resolution; which was read and passed to a second reading:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to purchase —— copies of the third volume of Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, being the debates of the second session of the Nineteenth Congress; one copy of which shall be distributed to each member of the present Senate, and to each ex-member of the Senate during the Nineteenth Congress; six copies shall be placed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate; and the remainder shall be kept by the Secretary for the future disposition of the Senate.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The following day, March 10 of the same year, the Journal discloses the following action of the Senate, still in special session:

The resolution directing the purchase of a number of copies of Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates was read a second time.

On motion by Mr. Woodbury,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Another precedent cited by Mr. Badger occurred in 1841. The Senate was convened in special session on the 4th of March of that year, and among other business which was done in open session, not partaking at all of the character of executive business, was the following:

Mr. Mangum submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That Blair & Rives be dismissed as Printers of the Senate for the Twenty-seventh Congress."

Mr. Mangum himself, in speaking of this precedent, said:

The practice of the Senate has been against the decision of the Chair. After the inauguration of General Harrison, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of business in open session, among which was the removal of Blair & Rives, the Printers to the Senate, as shown by the extracts which have been read from the Journal of 1841. At that session the Senate was called by the usual proclamation. They returned from the east portico after the inaugural address of General Harrison had been delivered, and among the other business done was my motion to remove the Printers, which occupied two or three days in the discussion, and excited a good deal of feeling, but no exception was taken to its being done in open session.—Congressional Globe and Appendix, volume 23, page 399 of the Appendix.

In looking to the Journal of March 10 and 11, 1841, we find the following entries corroborative of the statement of Mr. Mangum:

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1841.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Mangum, "That Blair & Rives be dismissed as Printers of the Senate for the Twenty-seventh Congress."

And after debate, and the consideration of executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

On March 11, 1841, the Journal concludes as follows:

After the consideration of executive business,

Mr. Rives submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

"Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant allowing extra compensation to the assistant doorkeeper, messenger, laborers, and pages of the Senate be so extended as to embrace other officers and clerks of the Senate."

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and

On motion by Mr. Bayard, the Senate adjourned.

Again, in the special session of the Senate called for March 4, 1849, on the 19th of that month, among other things will be found the following:

Mr. Foote submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court in the cases of Norris vs. The City of Boston and Smith vs. Turner be printed for the use of the Senate, the same to be printed in pamphlet form, in the same style and manner as the decisions of the Supreme Court are usually executed."

The question on that resolution was decided on the 20th of March. It was amended by striking out "five" and inserting "ten" thousand, and was thus adopted. On the same day—

Mr. Foote submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That 500 of the 2,000 copies of the geological report of David Dale Owen, which was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate at the first session of the last Congress, be delivered to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the use of his office, and that 2,000 additional copies be furnished for the use of the Senate."

Again, on the 22d of March—

Mr. Foote submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all the papers on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions relating to the application of John A. Rogers for a pension."

Also, on the same day—

Mr. Hale presented the memorial of John A. Blake, praying to be allowed certain charges for binding; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

On the 23d of the same month the Journal shows that—

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Foote on the 22d instant, directing that the papers relating to the application of John A. Rogers for a pension be transmitted to the Senate, and agreed thereto.

It would be difficult to add force by any comments to these precedents. They partake in no degree of the nature of executive business. While this discussion was proceeding, on the page of the volume of the Globe which I have already cited Mr. Clay used the following language:

The Chair seems to think that after prayer, which, by the by, was delivered in open Senate, the next thing to be done is to go into executive session. In this I cannot agree. We are a Senate, invested with all the powers that are given us for the transaction of business, except that which requires the co-operation of the other House.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that the resolution which I have the honor to offer calls for no assistance on the part of the other House; it is merely the expression of an opinion on the part of the Senate.

In the debate which ensued upon the appeal taken by Mr. Badger from the ruling of the Chair, I find the opinion not only of Mr. Clay, but Mr. Butler of South Carolina, Messrs. Hale, Underwood, Berrien, Douglas, Seward, Chase, and Davis of Massachusetts, all concurring against a similar point of order to that now pending before the Senate. Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, states his opinion in the following terms on page 401 of the volume of the Globe already mentioned:

In aid of my memory I have been turning over the pages of the National Intelligencer. We were in session a number of days in 1849; I think as late as the 20th of March. It will be found, on looking at the files of the Intelligencer containing the debates of that session, which are recorded there, that day after day we sat without going into executive session at all; that we considered, among other things, the right of my friend from Illinois [Mr. Shields] to his seat—which question was very largely debated, and considered day after day without going into executive session. We considered also a proposition to publish the decisions of the Supreme Court, which was debated at large. The debates are here. We also agreed to publish, as I very well remember, and I am sorry that we have it not here, a volume containing various public documents. Therefore it seems to me that our practice has been to go into open session and remain in open session until the motion was made and carried to go into executive session. In many instances we have sat many days, during such sessions as this, without going into executive session. We have had all kinds of business which was consistent with the organization of the Senate alone under the Constitution. I believe that has been the practice; and if it was right then, I believe it to be right at the present time.

Mr. Chase presented his views as follows:

The Constitution is sufficient to settle this question if we couple it with the previous practice of the Senate. The Constitution provides that Congress shall meet on the first Monday of December in each year, unless it be otherwise ordered by law. It also provides that on extraordinary occasions the President may convene both Houses, or either of them. Under that provision, the President, upon what he deems an extraordinary occasion, has convened the Senate. With what powers has the Senate assembled? I apprehend it is not the occasion which determines the extent of the power and the character of the body; the constitutional provisions determine its character. It is the Senate that is assembled—the complete Senate, clothed with all its constitutional powers. It is not the occasion upon which it is assembled which determines the powers of the Senate. If the President, instead of convening the Senate, had upon an extraordinary occasion—say, the failure of the appropriation bills—convened both Houses of Congress, would not the two Houses have been a complete Congress, adequate to the transaction of all business which any Congress may transact? I suppose there can be no doubt on that point; and if there is no doubt upon that, then this Senate, the Senate now assembled, is a complete Senate.

Mr. Douglas spoke as follows:

The Senator from Indiana seems to be under the impression that we have been convened in executive session. I do not understand that such is the nature of the call of the President; nor could he call us together for that purpose alone. The President has convened a special session of the Senate of the United States with the view that the attention of the Senate may be called to executive business; but it is the Senate that has assembled. I apprehend, then, we meet under the Constitution as the Senate. We come together in open session. We may do any act, after we have assembled, which it is competent for the Senate to do by itself without connection with the House of Representatives. I therefore understand that I have a right to bring in any resolution to call upon a Department for information which may relate to legislative business at the next session of Congress. I may feel it my duty to introduce a resolution calling for information, that it may be ready for action at the next session.

* * * * * * *

The fact of the President of the United States having intimated that the extraordinary occasion on which he has called us together relates to executive business does not limit our powers or our duties. He cannot limit our powers at this session by stating that he was induced to call us for a certain purpose, no more than an extraordinary Congress, called on account of a deficiency in the revenues or a deficiency in the appropriations can be confined to the objects for which the President calls them together. When we come together we meet under the Constitution and have all the powers which the Constitution gives us. Therefore, I regard this call as a call of the Senate of the United States—an extra session of the Senate meeting as a Senate—and we have all the powers of the Senate under the Constitution, and it requires a special motion to go into an executive session.

Mr. Seward, with his usual care and skill, condensed his views into the shape of a resolution, which he offered during this debate, to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Senate is not restricted at this session to the consideration of matters purely executive, but that such consideration may be extended to all matters proper to be transacted by the Senate without the co-operation of the House of Representatives.

This resolution appears to have grown so rapidly in the estimation of Senators that it became the will of the Senate by common consent, so much so that it was agreed to without even a division. I am warranted in saying this because, on March 7, two days later, I find in the Globe the following:

MR. HUNTER. I believe it has been decided by the Senate that we may at this session do whatever the Senate may do at any time alone without conjunction with the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. It has been so decided.

MR. HUNTER. That being the case, I offer a resolution, and as it is simply one of inquiry, I hope the Senate will, by unanimous consent, consider it at this time.

The resolution was offered, read, and adopted, and it in no way related to executive business. After that, and during the same special session of the Senate, many other questions were considered of like character.

The Senate was convened in special session by proclamation of the President on the 4th of March, 1853. The proceedings of that session are remarkable for their bearing upon the point now under consideration. On the 7th of March, Mr. Clayton, then Senator from Delaware, rose in open session and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested, if compatible in his opinion with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the propositions mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of State accompanying the executive message to the Senate of the 18th February last, as having been agreed upon by the Department of State, the British minister, and the State of Costa Rica, on the 30th of April, 1852, having for their object the settlement of the territorial controversies between the states and governments bordering on the river San Juan.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as it may be in the power of his Department to furnish, in regard to the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the State of Honduras to the islands of Roatan, Bonacca, Utila, Barbarat Helene, and Morat, in or near the Bay of Honduras.

In connection with the presentation of these important resolutions Mr. Clayton announced that as soon as he could do so without interfering with the necessary business of the Senate it was his purpose to discuss the topics which were suggested by them, and he expressed the hope that he would have an opportunity of doing so at an early period.

On the 9th of March Mr. Badger made a long personal explanation upon subjects purely legislative, leading to elaborate statements also from Senators Gwin, Hamlin, and Borland. At the conclusion of these statements, the speech of Mr. Clayton in support of his resolutions is to be found. It occupied two days in delivery, and fills twenty-five columns of the Globe. Its topics were of the greatest magnitude and importance, and he took a wide and powerful range in their discussion. Upon the conclusion of this very able speech, Mr. Douglas rose and gave notice that on the following day he would proceed to reply to it.

On the following day, Mr. Cooper submitted a resolution in regard to "the contract entered into with Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall for supplying the Japan squadron with coal, the price per ton which the said coal will cost delivered in the Chinese seas, the amount of commissions and insurance respectively, together with the rate of exchange which the Government will be required to pay for such of the coal as may be purchased in England," and in relation to other matters of a similar character.

Mr. Sebastian submitted a resolution touching Indian annuities, the amounts and the dates of each payment due to the Choctaw tribe of Indians, "including the interest on investments under the treaty of 1837, together with a statement in detail of the expenditures under the various treaty provisions for education."

Mr. Brodhead introduced a resolution touching the duties of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. Chase submitted a resolution "that 2,000 additional copies of the report of Captain R. B. Marcy of his exploration of the waters of the Red River" should be printed for the use of the Senate, "and that 200 copies of the report of Captain Sitgreaves, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be furnished to Captain Sitgreaves."

Then, after these preliminaries touching upon almost every subject connected with the legislation of the country, Mr. Douglas rose to reply to Mr. Clayton, which he did in a speech running through the entire day and filling sixteen columns of the Globe. On the 14th, Mr. Mason continued the debate on Mr. Clayton's resolution; on the 15th Mr. Clayton again spoke, and so the debate continued many days, interspersed with the presentation of all kinds of legislative questions and their continuous discussion. Among these legislative questions, sprinkled through the Globe containing the proceedings of that special session of the Senate, we find the following: "Mexican Boundary Commission," "Select Committee on Frauds," "Superintendent of Printing," "Printing of maps and charts," "Repairing Capitol rooms," "Indian expenditures," "Ringgold's Coast of California," "Duties on iron," "Naval works," "Light-house report," "Patent Office Building," "United States bonds abroad,"—a resolution and a speech on the subject by Mr. Brodhead—"Publication of Senate debates," "Printing a report on commerce," "Report of Committee on Frauds," "Commercial relations," "Custom-house at San Francisco," "Mexican claims," "The fisheries;" and then a long political debate seasoned with a good deal of animosity to close up with, in which Mr. Butler of South Carolina, Mr. Chase, and Mr. Weller participated.

On the 11th of April that special session of the Senate adjourned, after occupying thirty-seven days and filling eighty-seven pages of the Globe with its proceedings in open session.

Moving a little further down the stream of time and history we reach a most eventful and interesting period. The Senate of the United States was convened on the 4th of March, 1861, under extraordinary circumstances indeed. There are some here now, a few, who were here then. It is amazing to me that anybody, with a knowledge of that period, would interpose a point of order upon the resolution which I have presented. Questions were considered at that session fraught with the very existence of this Government. On the 13th of March Mr. Douglas introduced his famous resolution; which read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate what forts, arsenals, navy-yards, and other public works, within the limits of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, are now within the actual possession and occupation of the United States, and by what number of men each is garrisoned and held, and whether re-enforcements are necessary to retain the same; and if so, whether the Government has the power and means, under existing laws, to supply such re-enforcements within such time as the exigencies and necessities of the case may demand; and whether the defense and protection of the United States and their interests make it necessary and wise to retain military possession of such forts, places, and other property, except at Key West and Tortugas, and to recapture and reoccupy such others as the United States have been deprived of by seizure or surrender, for any other purpose and with a view to any other end than the subjugation and occupation of those States which have assumed the right to secede from the Union, and within whose limits such forts and other public property are situated; and if such be the motives for recapturing and holding the forts and other public property, what military force, including regulars and volunteers, would be necessary to enable the United States to reduce the said States aforesaid, and such others as are supposed to sympathize with them, to subjection and obedience to the laws of the Union, and to protect the Federal capital.

From that day till March 28, the day of the adjournment, a debate over this resolution raged with almost unparalleled violence. Every view that the human mind could take of the complicated powers of this Government was presented; every duty of legislation was discussed; every plan for the future was put forward. It is true that other legislative business was touched upon, but the resolution offered by Mr. Douglas was the main feature of that session. No words of mine could give additional strength to this precedent. It stands out by itself, overwhelming all points of order.

A special session of the Senate was convened on the 4th of March, 1865. On the question whether a certain resolution had been erroneously enrolled, a point of order was made, which elicited an opinion from Mr. Trumbull, which I desire to submit. On page 1426, of Part 2 of the Congressional Globe, Thirty-eighth Congress, second session, Mr. Trumbull said:

I will inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if it would not be competent at this session for the Senate to prescribe such rules as it thought proper in regard to its action in legislative matters for its own government, just as we form our committees with reference to legislative matters? Do we not admit members to seats in open session? This is not an executive session of the Senate; it is a special session of the Senate. We may do any business that the Senate can transact without the House acting in conjunction.

The Senate was convened in special session March 4, 1873. One of the first things to be observed in opening the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which contains the proceedings of that session, is a resolution offered by my predecessor, Mr. Morton, on the 6th of March, on the subject of trade between the United States and the dominion of Canada. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to the Senate, at its next session in December, the amount of imports from the provinces composing the Dominion of Canada to the United States for the years 1871 and 1872, and the amount of exports to the same provinces from the United States for the same years, and the amount of imports and exports between the United States and the same provinces for the two years preceding the termination of the reciprocity treaty.

Having offered the resolution, Mr. Morton said:

I shall ask to have the resolution laid on the table now; but if the session shall be prolonged for some days, I shall ask the Senate to take it up from the table for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks upon the question of the relations between the Dominion of Canada and England and this country.

It would seem that I have almost an exact precedent in the course pursued by Senator Morton, the leader of the opposition at that time on this floor.

I come next to a precedent which somewhat pains me to produce. I always regret to convince any one against his will, and most of all the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] It will be remembered with what alacrity he sprang to his feet yesterday, bringing to bear upon my resolution all the weight of his parliamentary experience and reputation acquired while presiding over this body as well as in a long and distinguished service as a member of it. I could not at that time have flattered myself with the support of so eminent an authority, with the opinion of that Senator himself, given under less exciting circumstances, more maturely considered, and more elaborately put before this body. It will hardly be believed, and yet it is a fact, as will be seen on the thirty-eighth page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the special session of the Forty-third Congress, that on the 11th of March that distinguished gentleman so far forgot that the Senate in special session could do nothing but executive business as to submit, have read, and considered at that time the following very legislative resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War be directed to consider the expediency of dedicating to the public use so much of the island of Mackinac, lying in the Straits of Mackinac, within the county of Mackinac, in the State of Michigan, as is now held by the United States under military reservation or otherwise, (excepting the Fort Mackinac and so much of the present reservation thereof as bounds it to the south of the village of Mackinac, and to the west, north, and east, respectively, by lines drawn north and south, east and west, at a distance from the present fort flag-staff of four hundred yards,) to be reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale, under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a national public park, or grounds, for health, comfort, and pleasure, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; that all persons who shall locate or settle upon or occupy the same or any part thereof, except as herein provided, shall be considered trespassers and removed therefrom; that said public park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of War, whose duty it shall be to make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition. The Secretary may, in his discretion, grant leases, for building purposes, of small parcels of ground, at such places in said park as shall require the erection of buildings for the accommodation of visitors, for terms not exceeding ten years; all of the proceeds of said leases, and all other revenues derived from any source connected with said park, to be expended, under his direction, in the management of the same and in the construction of roads and bridle-paths therein. He shall provide against the wanton destruction of game or fish found within said park, and against their capture or destruction for any purposes of use or profit. He also shall cause all persons trespassing upon the same, when by law thus set apart, to be removed therefrom, and generally shall be authorized to take all such measures as shall be necessary or proper to fully carry out the objects and purposes expressed; and that the Secretary be required to report to the Senate, at the opening of the next session of Congress, whether or not such dedication would be incompatible with the public service.

Sir, it would seem as if this resolution was enough to estop the Senator from Michigan on the point of order now before the Senate; but, as if Providence intended to be kind to me on this occasion, I find that he followed this most extraordinary resolution with an extremely earnest speech in favor of the power of the Senate somehow or other by itself, and without the aid of the House of Representatives, to abstract from the public domain the Island of Mackinac and dedicate and set it apart as a national public park for health, comfort, and pleasure, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people—of course of Michigan. The proceeding is an extraordinary one, and I think could not have taken place in any but an extraordinary session. It was not executive in its character as we understand executive duties in this body; but the Senator from Michigan aimed to make it very executive in itself, and, what is still more extraordinary, the Senate at that time absolutely adopted that resolution on the yeas and nays by a vote of yeas 37 and nays 13. Points of order slept at that time so far as the Senator from Michigan was concerned. The Senator knows that I hold him in kindly esteem, but I certainly would commend him hereafter to withhold his points of order on subjects of this kind. After the adoption of that resolution it would not be surprising to find scattered through the records of the proceedings of that session the consideration of such questions as steerage immigrant passengers, railroad lands, and railroad bonds, a resolution by Mr. Fenton on the subject of the finances, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire what measure or measures can be adopted by the Government which shall give to the country a currency convertible into gold at the will of the holder, thus securing greater stability in the exchanges of trade, in the work of production and investment, and in the compensation of labor; and to report, by bill or otherwise, at the next session of Congress.

Nor are we surprised to find that Mr. Morton, taking advantage of the fact that the Senator from Michigan and others had waived all points of order, asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce and have considered and adopted a resolution on the subject of the emancipation of slavery in the island of Porto Rico, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States have received with joy the intelligence that the republican Government of Spain have abolished slavery in the island of Porto Rico, and raised the colored people of that island from the condition of slaves to the rights and privileges of citizens of the Spanish Republic.

Resolved, That by this act the people of Spain have given new assurance to the world that in establishing republican institutions they are actuated by a genuine love of liberty and sincere regard for the natural rights of all men; and that it will be accepted as an omen of the power and perpetuity of the Spanish Republic.

It is aside from my purpose or I might comment somewhat on the duration of the aforesaid Spanish Republic and on the auspicious omen which was hailed at that time. The session then jogged along attending to the withdrawal of papers, agricultural reports, the Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, and other kindred subjects. The consideration of these questions so broadened out on every side that the then Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Ferry, felt himself at last impelled to make a point of order similar to the one now pending before this body. It was somewhat elaborately discussed, and finally on page 204 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have cited in this connection it will be found that the point of order was decided adversely to the Senator from Connecticut by a vote on the yeas and nays of 25 yeas to 19 nays. This action of the Senate at that time I may be pardoned for denominating in the nature of a clincher.

Again, on the 4th of March, 1875, the Senate was convened in special session. In that session there arose one of the gravest and most important questions ever presented to this body, which was considered in open session. It was upon a resolution offered by Mr. Morton; which read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of Louisiana, and represented by William P. Kellogg as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

Upon this resolution was launched one of the most memorable discussions in our history. It took a wide range and embraced a broad field of questions and illustrations. No point of order was made against its consideration.

On the 8th of March of the same year, as appears on page 2 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 1, Mr. Clayton, then Senator from Arkansas, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and three members of the Committee on Territories, making seven in all, be appointed to visit the Indian Territory during the recess of the Senate, with authority to inquire into the condition of affairs in that country, the manner in which justice is administered, and the wants and capacities of the lawful inhabitants thereof with respect to self-government; and to report at the next session of the Senate the result of their inquiry and what legislation, if any, is needed.

Upon the presentation of this resolution the then Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Ferry, who never seemed weary of raising points of order on this subject and never satisfied with the ruling of the Senate, again interposed one. The point of order made led to a discussion which is now of great value. On page 26 of the volume of the RECORD just cited the distinguished Senator from Ohio, now a member of this body, [Mr. SHERMAN,] spoke as follows:

I have but a word to say about this matter. I am afraid the Senate will do today what it has very often done, confuse the question arising upon the point of order with that of the propriety of the appointment of the committee. That the Senate of the United States have the power to pass this resolution I do not think there can be any doubt. That the Senate of the United States, although sitting in a called executive session, may authorize a committee to make inquiries even for a legislative purpose I do not think there can be any doubt. The Senate of the United States is a permanent body. We have the same power now that we would have if the House of Representatives was present, except only that we cannot pass laws; but we may inform ourselves, may prepare ourselves, and seek information wherever we choose.

I shall vote against the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas because I do not think we ought to organize this committee. While I shall vote against it on that ground, at the same time I have no doubt that the Senate of the United States has the power and the right, if it chooses to exercise it, to pass a resolution of this kind. Therefore, while I am against the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas, I would not bind the Senate not to pass a resolution of this kind.

In answer to an objection made by Mr. Hamlin, Mr. Morton responded as follows:

I would ask the Senator from Maine this question: What is the difference in principle or in power between appointing a standing Committee on Indian Affairs, which we created yesterday, to consider all legislation in regard to Indian matters, and appointing a special committee of the kind designated by this resolution?

Again Mr. Morton observes:

A resolution lies on the table which I offered on the first day of this session and upon which I was told this same question of order would be raised. I was therefore at some trouble to examine into what had been the action of the Senate in executive sessions, and although it has not been uniform, yet the general current of that action has been to recognize the power of the Senate to do anything at a called executive session that did not require the co-operation of the House of Representatives. The passage of a bill does require the co-operation of the House of Representatives, and therefore you cannot pass a bill at this session and have it lie over till next winter and then go before the House of Representatives. That bill cannot get before the House then for other reasons than the one named by the Senator from Maine; but whatever the Senate can do when the House is in session that does not require the co-operation of the House, that the Senate can do when the House is not in session; and I think that is the general current of the precedents of the Senate.

I need hardly pause to ask what the House would have to do with the consideration of the resolution which I have offered to this body. The answer is too obvious for the question even to be put.

Mr. Howe, then a member of this body, presented his views thus:

Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated the true rule. Though we are convened by an executive order and for executive business, we are convened; this is the Senate, and the Senate can do to-day whatever the Senate is capable of doing alone at any time. It seems to me the reason is very manifest why you cannot pass a bill to be considered by the House of Representatives at the next session. That reason is this: it is legislative power which passes a bill, and the whole legislative power is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and Congress consists of two Houses, the Senate and House of Representatives; and so you are careful to recite in every bill which goes from either House that it is an enactment "by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled."

* * * * * * *

I shall vote that this resolution is entirely in order, and I wish the Senate would keep that question distinct in its mind from the other question as to whether the resolution is expedient or not. I have as yet heard no reason offered why the resolution should be adopted; but I am just as unable to discover any reason why we should deny to the Senate the power of adopting it if it be a proper one.

Mr. Sargent thus expressed his views:

Upon the point of order I intend to vote that it is within the power of the Senate to receive this resolution. I shall do so because I think the Senate has this power and has exercised it upon a great many occasions, and I should be very sorry to have a precedent deliberately set which would prevent us hereafter from acting upon matters of this nature.

Mr. EDMUNDS, who was against the resolution, expressed himself upon the point of order as follows:

I am not clear by any means that the Senate has not the power in its present session to take any step which it thinks fit to do in respect of acquiring information, either by instructing a committee here to inquire into any subject which may be a proper matter for legislative consideration or otherwise. I am inclined to think we can do it. Of course, legislation does not grow out of it at this session; but I think it would be a little strange to hold that this body being convened as a constitutional body may not exercise its own judgment in respect of what matters it will consider at this present time. When it comes to passing a bill, that is another thing. It may not have the power to do that; but certainly it seems to me that it ought to have the power under the Constitution to deliberate upon any proper topic; and therefore I should have great hesitation in voting that the offering of this resolution is out of order.

Mr. Frelinghuysen concurred with the views which I have just cited, in the following terms:

My opinion is very clear that the Senate has a right to obtain information in any way, to pass resolutions, to appoint committees to obtain information. I am very clear that the Senate has a right to give information. It may be very important to certain branches of the Government that an expression of the opinion of this body should in certain emergencies be made, and therefore I am not in favor of taking any action which will restrict the power of this body, while I shall vote against the resolution on its merits.

Sir, the resolution which I have offered proposes to give information upon a great and overshadowing question; it proposes to give the country and the various departments of the Government information as to the opinion which the Senate of the United States entertains upon a great public matter, and I concur with the view so tersely and strongly stated by Mr. Frelinghuysen that—

It may be very important to certain branches of the Government that an expression of the opinion of this body should in certain emergencies be made.

The whole subject afterward being tabled, the point of order was carried with it.

A similar point of order was afterwards, on the 20th of March, made against the reception or consideration of a resolution offered by the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. Frelinghuysen) relative to the condition of Louisiana. After discussion, the decision of the Senate will be found on page 95 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing the proceedings of that session, in a vote by the yeas and nays, wherein the point of order was overruled by a vote of 28 to 24.

These precedents would appear to be sufficient. They are almost, if not entirely, unbroken in their line. It is not merely a question of weight of authority, but the decisions are practically unanimous to the effect that the Senate, convened in session as it is now, may express its opinion by resolution involving the most elaborate discussion of the widest range of subjects; it may call for information on every branch of legislation; it may discuss the propriety of such call; it may compose standing and select committees, many of which can have nothing whatever of an executive character referred to them. It is only necessary to cite the practices of the present session to prove all I have said. The very last act of the then distinguished Senator from Maine, and now the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, as he was bowing himself from the presence of this body, was to present a resolution upon the great and important question of the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States—a resolution now pending before this body. On motion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] the Senate, a few days since, expressed its opinion on the subject of the assassination of the Czar of Russia, and sent that opinion to the uttermost parts of the earth. It has not only raised all the ordinary standing committees of the body to which business of every possible description may be assigned or referred, but it has created select committees which, as I have said, can have no relation whatever to business sent to this body by the Executive. We witness daily the withdrawal of papers from the files of this body, and other orders taken with the express view of future legislative action.

The resolution now pending, against which the point of order has been made, simply calls for an expression of this body upon a question fairly within the scope of its duties. I am very willing to submit to the decision of the Senate in view of the history of the Senate, as shown by its own record, whether the point of order is well taken.

Thanking the Senate for the courtesy extended to me, I close this discussion so far as I am concerned.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to add to what the Senator from Indiana has said, the clause of the Constitution which I will read:

He [the President] shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper.

The proclamation of the President which convened this session called it an "extraordinary session;" and that is all the language that either the Constitution or the proclamation of the President has applied to it.

Mr. MORRILL. It was not, Mr. President, from any reluctance on my part that the question presented by the resolution of the Senator from Indiana should be discussed here at this extra session, but it was solely in reference to a procrastination of the session of the Senate that I made the objection at the threshold. It would seem by the precedents which have been made heretofore by the Senate that the Senate have always had a great hesitation about doing anything except what the session was specially called to consider, and the Senator from Indiana shows a little remarkably with what alacrity the minority always assume the position of the preceding minority. The precedents cited and the quotations from the remarks of Senators it will be noticed were not from the democratic side of the Senate in favor of doing anything except what the session was called for. I am very glad the Senator from Indiana pays so much deference to the opinions of those formerly in this body who represented political positions antagonistic to that of the then democratic side of this Chamber.

I had supposed that we had upon several occasions introduced resolutions confining the business of the Senate to the particular purposes for which we were called together. So far as I am concerned, I withdraw the point of order, as I suppose the resolution will go over at all events for to-day, and will not come up for discussion until to-morrow. I assure the Senator from Indiana that if there is a disposition here to discuss this or any other subject, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned I think they are quite ready.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish merely to say that I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana was right as to his power to offer the resolution, and that the Senate might have received it and acted upon it; but when he proposes to-morrow to take up this question, I think some very good reasons can be given why he should not be allowed to open a financial debate at this time. While I believe the Senator is perfectly right on the point of order, and that he has a right to present the resolution to be considered when the Senate is ready to consider it, I think his own good judgment will lead him to conclude that it is not advisable for him now to open a discussion so broad and comprehensive as his resolution invites. If it be opened, we may as well bid good-bye to any hope of a short executive session. However, that subject will be more properly considered to-morrow when the Senator proposes to call up his resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. The resolution will be printed and go over under the rule?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and go over under the rules, objection being made to its present consideration.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be considered at the present time.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let it be read for information only the first time, subject to all objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of its Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, Principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let the resolution go over under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. DAWES. In order to save time, I offer several other resolutions which I have in my hand. If there is objection, of course they must go over; and I shall ask to have them taken up after the resolution which I have just offered has been passed upon by the Senate. I offer the following resolution, which perhaps the Senator from Ohio will not object to considering at this time:

Resolved, That George C. Gorham, of California, be, and he hereby is, elected Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution with the same view:

Resolved, That Harrison H. Riddleberger, of Virginia, be, and hereby is, elected Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles W. Johnson, of Minnesota, be, and hereby is, elected Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over, objection being made.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That James R. Young, of Pennsylvania, be, and hereby is, elected Principal Executive Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D., of the city of Washington, be, and hereby is, elected Chaplain of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose to ask the Senate to consider these resolutions until after the Senate has passed upon the first resolution I have offered. I submit them now in order that they may lie over under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions have gone over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 24, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIST OF DEPARTMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the heads of each of the Executive Departments be, and hereby are, directed to report to the Senate at the beginning of the next session of Congress complete lists of any and all books, reports, documents, and pamphlets issued, printed, or published by their respective Departments, and by each and every bureau and officer thereof, from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1881.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, without interfering with the resolution, that my impression is that on inquiry he will find that that information is all gathered together in one place, in the Government Printing Office, and that each of those documents, the number printed, and the cost could be furnished with great ease there. I think if the Senator would inquire of the Public Printer he would find that that officer can furnish him without difficulty what the heads of Departments will require a good deal of work to furnish. But I merely make that suggestion to him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I apprehend that it cannot be furnished in that way, because it has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of the documents, that a list similar to this be furnished. It was recommended at the last session. As I have been unable to find any document showing a list of the publications of the Government, I have offered the resolution, and I propose to offer another, directing the Secretary of the Senate to furnish all those not included in the regular serial list furnished to the Senate, so that at the beginning of the next session we may have a list of everything published by the Government from 1789 to 1881.

Mr. HOAR. I do not suppose that the Public Printer would have a list of the old documents, but of the documents published since the establishment of that office.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think he has, but I will inquire. The resolution can do no harm. If he has the information, the heads of Departments can obtain it there and send that list to us.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIST OF CONGRESSIONAL PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate at the beginning of the next session of Congress complete lists of any and all books, reports, documents, and pamphlets issued, printed, or published by order of Congress and of either House other than those contained in the numbered series of session documents from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1881.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I offered yesterday in relation to the officers of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. DAWES, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of its Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, Principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, on a recent occasion I stated the reasons that determined my vote on the organization of the Senate, not expecting to satisfy a class of politicians accustomed to party discipline and unable to appreciate free thought and independent action. Fair criticism is always entitled to respect, and the public man who shrinks from it, even when harsh, does not deserve forbearance. An attempt has been made to have it appear that the Legislature which elected me to the Senate contained a republican majority, and that the State of Illinois, on the popular vote, was also largely republican. Both these assumptions are unfounded. The Legislature at that time stood as follows, according to the official compilation of the Secretary of State:

	Senate.	House.
Republicans	21	79
Democrats	25	67
Independents	5	6

It is thus seen that the republicans and the democrats were almost equally divided, and that a few independents turned the scale. For President, Hayes received 278,232, Tilden 258,601, and Cooper 17,233. Hayes's clear majority was 2,398 in a poll of over half a million. These figures prove how closely balanced the two parties were in 1876–'77. More than 90 per cent. of the votes voluntarily cast for me as Senator were from democrats, without pledges, conditions, or correspondence of any kind whatever. They knew my political antecedents, and they also knew that neither the honor which was freely conferred upon me nor any other distinction that could be offered would alter any conviction I had formed or deflect me from the course of duty as it appeared to my best judgment. Having accepted this generous trust under these circumstances, good faith required me to sustain the organization of the Senate as it had existed in the last Congress. No principle was involved, but merely the control of committees and of officers. I have voted steadily against change, and I shall continue in that way until the end is reached, being answerable only to my conscience and to my constituents for this act.

What my friend, the distinguished Senator from New York, properly calls "a constitutional majority" was disclosed when the Vice-President, not a member of this body, gave the casting voice for the committees. However fleeting or fractional that majority may be, we are commanded to accept it and to obey it.

The majority that chose the committees is fairly entitled to choose the officers of the Senate. One naturally goes with the other in order to perfect the organization. This conclusion will neither be delayed nor obstructed by any vote of mine, and it cannot be reached too soon for the public interest. I do not regret at all that the new Administration, which has to confront the country with its policy, should have the control of both branches of Congress. The responsibility for measures to be proposed cannot be avoided, with the power to initiate all legislation. The majority is not large enough to indulge in rash experiments, and the minority is sufficiently strong to check any tendency to excess. Between these two elements the great voice of independent opinion can always be heard with effect, and the country has every prospect of peace and prosperity.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I hope the honorable Senator from Massachusetts does not intend to press the consideration of the resolution at this time. I hope he does not intend to intervene to the obstruction and the detriment of the public business which has been confided to the Senate. I should hope that, upon consideration, he would feel it to be his pleasure and his duty, either himself to let the resolution lie on the table to be called up hereafter, and to move to go into executive session, that we may attend to business, or that he would indicate a willingness that I should do so with his concurrence. If either of these courses is agreeable to him, I shall have nothing further to say to the Senate at this time.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I heartily agree with the Senator from Illinois that the permanent organization of the Senate should be as speedily accomplished as possible, and I think nothing will so contribute to expedition in the transaction of all the executive business of the Senate as to settle these uncertain questions at the threshold. They have caused, as the Senator from Ohio must certainly have observed, a great deal of delay, which has attended this executive session, of which he cannot be so tired as I am myself. In order to bring this executive session to a close as quickly as possible, I feel it to be my duty to press this and the other resolutions, which seem to me to stand at the threshold; namely, the proper organization of the Senate.

Therefore, agreeing with the Senator from Ohio in the desirability of accomplishing the purposes of this session, I desire to press this resolution at as early a day as I can. If it would suit the convenience of the Senator from Ohio to have time for the preparation of any remarks which he desires to submit upon the proper organization of the Senate, I have no doubt that that courtesy which controls this Senate will accord to him any time that he may indicate. If at any future reasonable period it will be more convenient for him to address the Senate upon the subject than now, and then come to a vote upon it, I shall be for one quite anxious to accommodate the Senator; but if it is not for the purpose of suiting the personal convenience of the Senator in view of any remarks he desires to submit, but a general idea of the Senator that we postpone to the indefinite future the organization of this body, I can hardly acquiesce in the suggestion.

Mr. PENDLETON. I knew that if I made an appeal to the courtesy of the Senator in behalf of my own convenience I should meet with the response which I have just had. I do not, however, make any appeal on that ground. I desire to expedite the public business by attending to the business of the Senate. I desire that this resolution, which will give rise to more or less obstruction of the public business, shall be laid aside to be called up when we shall have done that which we are called upon here to do.

When the Senator offered his resolution yesterday, I hardly thought that he intended that it should be pressed very soon to a conclusion. I rather thought that he intended it as a kindly reminder to this side of the Chamber that the power had passed away from it, and that it was lodged in what has been called and indorsed by high authority to-day—but I think improperly—"the constitutional majority of the Senate." There is no majority of Senators here on either side; the Senators are equally divided politically; and that condition of affairs gives rise to the exercise of a constitutional contrivance to rescue the Senate from a dilemma, when the exigencies of the politics of fifty million people and thirty-eight States eventuate in an equal number of Senators upon each side. It is well known to the Senate that some of the most astute and penetrating minds in the country do not believe that the constitutional power of the Vice-President extends to questions affecting the organization of the Senate. I have no intention to discuss or further allude to that question at this time.

I had thought that the resolution was a gentle reminder to us also that we were no longer to enjoy the monopoly of a distinction which has been very frequently and ostentatiously commented upon, that confederate brigadiers sat only on this side of the Chamber; that we were no longer to have the statement made of the democrats alone, which I have heard made during two years in this Senate so often, that the majority ruled the Senate, and the caucus ruled the majority, and confederate brigadiers ruled the caucus. Indeed it rather seemed to me that the introduction of this resolution meant to give us notice of one of two things—either that the control of the caucus, which has been so often ascribed to some of my fellow-Senators here—I mean the confederate brigadiers—was exercised in other caucuses than ours, or else that our friends on the other side of the Chamber were so well pleased with the experiment they had made as far as they had gone that they intended to try it a little further by giving to us another confederate brigadier to take charge of the order and business of the floor. If this was the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts in any of its aspects, I beg to assure him that we will take notice upon the mere introduction of his resolution of these facts without any further enforcement.

But why should we enter upon this business? The Senate is organized; the clerks are at their desks; the Sergeant-at-Arms is at the door; the messengers and pages and subordinates are all performing faithfully, justly, to the satisfaction of everybody, on the floor at least, the various duties. Now, since the committees have been appointed the Senate is perfectly equipped for the regular and orderly transaction of its business. We need no change in order to accomplish that. Your table, Mr. President, is piled with business; the committees are charged with business. Why not go on in the regular way and discharge that business, and if afterward it be either our pleasure or our convenience to discuss this resolution, then bring it up?

I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I appeal to my honorable colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] and to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who were yesterday so apprehensive that a few remarks by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] would protract this session or call for an extra session—I appeal to them in behalf of the interest that they expressed for a short executive session, to interpose their influence, great as it justly is, in order that this resolution may lie upon the table. If that course is not taken, it will be necessary to enter into a long discussion involving the personnel of the present organization of the Senate, involving the personnel of the proposed organization of the Senate, and involving an investigation of all the precedents.

Here I may say in the hearing of the conservative Senator from Massachusetts that the precedents are all against him, even from the very beginning of the Government and during the troublous times of 1861. Moreover we shall be obliged to give our attention to the considerations so eloquently urged only two years ago by so many Senators on the other side of the Chamber (the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] whom I do not see now in his seat and other honorable Senators whom I do see) who foretold the doom that would come upon the Senate if speedily and hastily the officers of the Senate were changed.

Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate; I appeal to those gentlemen who believed yesterday that debate was not proper here; I appeal to everybody who desires that the public business shall be attended to and that the Senate shall adjourn; I appeal to all my fellow-Senators who desire that we should speedily execute the great duties that have been devolved upon us by the President, that this resolution shall lie over; for in a spirit of entire kindness, without the slightest disposition to transgress in the least possible degree the decorum and moderation which should characterize our intercourse upon this floor, I say to them that the resolution will not speedily pass the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. Understanding that executive business is the main if not the whole object the President had in view in convening us, I make that motion in order that we may perform the duties that have been devolved upon us.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Vermont is mistaken in that announcement. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with myself upon all questions. I exchanged the pair one day to suit the convenience of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] who was then absent from the Chamber.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; that is all right.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) By the vote thus far I perceive that the division takes a political direction, and I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] on all political questions. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) Upon this and like questions I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.] Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On political questions for the time being I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] The voting so far indicates that this is a political question, and I refrain from voting. If the Senator from Kentucky were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—33.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Plumb,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller,	Teller,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—12.

Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance.
Ferry,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, notwithstanding the great number of very important nominations that the President of the United States has sent to us, and in the face of another communication just received, it is evident that the majority of this Chamber do not propose to go on with the business for which we were called together. I find on the table among the caucus nominees the following resolution:

Resolved, That Harrison H. Riddleberger, of Virginia, be, and hereby is, elected Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate.

As I have heard it whispered that some man of that name (I assume it cannot be this man, but the similarity of names is striking) was the person who introduced what was generally known as the repudiation bill that passed through the Legislature of Virginia, and the people were only saved from the infliction of it by the veto of the democratic governor, I should like a little while to seek out whether this is the person, what character of bill that was, and why the republican party should become so attached to a confederate brigadier with these antecedents, who was a Hancock elector as well. I should like to inquire into that matter, and I move that the Senate adjourn in order to give us time for the inquiry. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) As before announced, and I announce now for the rest of the day, I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] Where he present I should vote "nay"

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I again announce my pair with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL,] and I shall not take the time of the Senate to again announce it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Hale,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sherman,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—13.

Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,	Williams.
Ferry,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Looking into the Journal, and recurring to the proclamation of the President convening the Senate in executive session, I find these words:

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

Inasmuch as I see on the desk of the Chair a communication just received from the President, I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business in accordance with this proclamation.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) Inasmuch as there are likely to be several roll-calls to-day, I announce once for all that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired, as I before announced, with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] I should vote "nay" if the Senator from Georgia were present.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] was compelled to leave the city in consequence of serious illness, and is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I shall not make the announcement any more, but will let it extend over all the votes taken to-day.

The result of the roll-call was as follows:

YEAS—32.

Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Butler,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Hale,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sherman,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—12.

Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Ferry,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,	Williams.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote of the Senate being equally divided, the Chair votes "nay;" and the motion is lost.

Mr. HARRIS. Inasmuch as the Chair has given the casting vote against proceeding to the consideration of executive business, I take for granted that the Chair deems it proper that the day should be devoted by the members of this body to the consideration of the various nominations now pending before the committees; and in order that the Senate may so devote the day, I move that the Senate do now adjourn; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) It has already been announced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] that my colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with him on political questions. I announce it again now, but will not continue to make the announcement if there should be subsequent calls of the yeas and nays.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) As I announced before, I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and I shall not announce it again. Let it be understood that we are paired on all these votes.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Fair,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Butler,	Gorman,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Grover,	Morgan,	Walker.
Camden,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Frye,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sherman,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—15.

Anthony,	George,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Ferry,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Williams.
Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the pending resolution on the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. FERRY. If not paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—33.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Dawes,	Harrison,
Blair,	Conger,	Edgerton,	Hawley,
Burnside,	Conkling,	Frye,	Hill of Colorado,
Cameron of Pa.,	Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Hoar,

Ingalls,	Mahone,	Platt of N. Y.,	Teller,
Jones of Nevada,	Miller,	Plumb,	Van Wyck.
Logan,	Mitchell,	Rollins,
McDill,	Morrill,	Sawyer,
McMillan,	Platt of Conn.,	Sherman,

ABSENT—15.

Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Ferry,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to submit a motion, and before doing so shall give my reasons for it. I am sorely troubled in spirit. Politics makes strange bedfellows. I have heard for several years past the air beaten with cries coming from this Chamber, from the other, from the hustings, from the pulpit, from the press, everywhere beaten into the ears of the people of the North, men, women, and children, that the country was in danger of being placed under the domination of confederate brigadiers. I remember on this floor about five years ago the State convention of my State called to make a constitution was denounced as a rebel, revolutionary, democratic convention; and when we have modestly thrown back to them that there were on their side confederate brigadiers who had been appointed to office—Akerman, Longstreet, Mosby, and others—the reply has been that they had brought forth fruit meet for repentance. Yet I have seen a whole party take into full fellowship and brotherhood a confederate brigadier who announced himself a democrat, yet a democrat, always a democrat, and who proclaimed, and I may say almost defiantly, and turning to the republicans said that he had no apologies to make or excuse to offer for the course that he had pursued; that he had none to make here, he had never made any elsewhere; and yet this confederate democratic brigadier, in the presence of the Senate and of the whole people, was surrounded and an ovation given to him, and the right hand of friendship and fellowship extended. I do not understand that. I cannot see why a confederate democratic brigadier should be blessed on one side and cursed on the other.

There is another thing that troubles me, Mr. President. We are called upon here to reorganize the officers of the Senate, and one of the nominations made is the nomination of a gentleman who is not only a democrat, as I understand, but was a democratic elector at the last presidential election on the Hancock and English ticket, and he is to be given to us by this same republican party as the Sergeant-at-Arms. Mr. President, have the days of the millennium come around? What does all this mean? I do not understand; I cannot understand it. I remember also that this same party have proclaimed in the face of the whole world that they were the authors, the finishers of that clause of the Constitution, in the fourteenth amendment, which I approve and indorse, that the validity of the public debt shall never be questioned. But do they now mean to say that that applies only to the national debt, that the nation shall not dishonor itself or disgrace itself, but that a State may repudiate its debt, and that they may take into their fold and place in the most important office in this Senate a man who is a readjuster according to his own showing?

I remember the other day in the speech, which was certainly adroit, of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] he was asked the questions, "Are you a democrat? Are you a republican?" And he replied from his place in the Senate: "I was elected as a readjuster. Do you know what they are?" The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] did not seem to know. I do. I understand the word "readjuster" means that the Senate is to be readjusted in all its officers; that the republican party readjusts itself under the banner of a confederate brigadier-general, a democrat, who proclaims that he never has repented of any of his past sins; and the offices of the Senate are to be readjusted under his leadership.

Mr. President, that may be. Politics makes strange bedfellows; but I do hope and trust in the Lord that I never shall lie down on such a bed as that. I want to study these things over; I do not understand them; and I propose to submit a motion by which we may have time to understand this new arrangement, this new readjustment, whereby the republican party takes back, as far as one of the important offices, that of Secretary of the Senate, is concerned, a man whom we would call down in Texas a pitching mustang, who pitches out of the republican traces whenever it suits him to pitch out—he is to come back; and why? I remember that the papers were full for months that the Senator from Virginia would vote for certain officers; that he would vote to turn the Secretary of the Senate out and put that man in. I see it is about to be done. That is another portion of the readjustment. The pitching mustangs are to be taken into this circle of readjustment along with the confederate brigadier-generals—democrats who ran as democrats on the electoral ticket, claiming to be readjusters. If that goes before the country and the republican party can stand it, I am perfectly sure that we can on this side. But let us think about this thing a little; and in order that we may think about it, study over it, and comprehend this new readjustment, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will again state that I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

YEAS—32.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business the yeas are 32 and the nays are 32. The motion is lost.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the six or seven persons nominated to fill the various offices in the organization of the Senate, with the exception of the distinguished divine who is nominated for Chaplain and the gentleman nominated for Secretary, are wholly unknown to me, and I suppose unknown to a majority of the Senators upon this floor. Senators who have been here as long as I have been know that the gentleman nominated for Secretary is an efficient and competent officer, not more so than the present incumbent. In respect to the others I have known nothing until they were nominated, I have had no opportunity of ascertaining anything as to the character of men they are; and in order that I, in common with other Senators, may have time to satisfy myself as to the propriety of turning out a corps of officers that I undertake to say—and every Senator upon this floor will verify the fact—have been efficient and obliging and blameless, before we substitute the new names for those gentlemen we should take time to maturely consider the propriety of the step, and in order that we may do so, I move to postpone the further consideration of the pending resolution until the first Monday in December next; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Several SENATORS. It is debatable.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a debatable motion.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate on this motion, but I desire to answer the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee, for it certainly is a very novel one.

He says that he desires time to examine into the capability of the gentlemen nominated by the republicans for officers of the Senate, that the Senate may understand whether or not they are suitable persons to be chosen. This would not appear strange at all if the Senator desired this examination for the purpose of ascertaining whether he would cast his vote in favor of these men or not. Now, I presume he will not say here that under any consideration whatever he would vote for either of these men that have been named. When he says that their names are brought forward without any knowledge of himself, and I suppose that might apply to his side of the Chamber, as to the fitness of these individuals, I would like to ask him what notice did he and his colleagues give to this side of the Chamber when they changed every officer in it? What history did these gentlemen give to us of those men? What information did they give us in reference to their qualifications and fitness? The names were presented here in the Senate and voted without a word.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. The names of the gentlemen who are now the officers of this Senate were presented here about two years ago, and they were debated; the question of the election of these officers and the removal of the then officers of the Senate was discussed at large for two or three days. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the then Senator from Maine (Mr. Blaine) opposed the organization of the Senate at that time by the election of new officers. We now have officers, the Senate is organized, and the proposition now before the Senate is to disorganize the officers by electing new officers.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point at all. What I was speaking to was the fact that we had not sent word to your side of the Chamber as to the capacity of these officers; had not gone and consulted your side of the Chamber in reference to it. When I said "without a word," I meant a word as to the character and fitness of the nominees. The Senator from Tennessee appeals to us that the gentlemen on the other side should have a certain kind of knowledge as to the fitness of these nominees. Why, sir, this is an unheard-of proceeding, to require one side of the Chamber to present names for consideration to the other side of the Chamber before we shall decide as to whether we shall elect them or not, if we have the power to do it. No such thing has ever been thought of before at any time, so far as the different party organizations are concerned.

I thought when I rose that I would only say this much; but now the Senator from Texas says that one of the persons selected by our side of the Chamber, the person selected for Secretary of the Senate, is what is termed in Texas a kicking mustang. By that remark I should infer that there was another kind of mustang that is not a kicking mustang.

Mr. HARRIS. "Pitching mustangs," not "kicking."

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to apply any such—I will not say epithet—or to try to cast opprobrium on any officers here by comparing them with mustangs or with broad-horns or with anything else; but in answer to the Senator I will say that the gentleman he referred to is as well qualified a man as ever performed the duties of Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I said nothing against the gentleman referred to. I know him well. He was an excellent officer, one of the best I think that could be presented. That is not the point with me. As a question of party discipline, I was simply trying to understand how the republican party could place a gentleman in such an important position who was in the habit of doing pretty much as he pleased on questions of party nominations. That was the point I made, and I referred to it in the manner I did not with any design to injure him in the least.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Texas that this side of the Chamber is under many obligations for the kindly suggestion that he has made to them in reference to the manner in which they should manage their own party discipline. I know the Senator is quite a disciplinarian; he has been in former times, and is entitled to much credit for that; but if he will only be kind enough to allow us to manage our own affairs in our own way, we shall not try to interfere with the management of his affairs in his way. If we make mistakes, you are not responsible for them, but we are. Let the responsibility rest with us; we take it, and ask no man to share it with us.

Now, then, let me say, so far as that is concerned, that I hope the other side of the Chamber will allow us, whether we mismanage our affairs or not, to at least think that we are of age and are competent to decide for ourselves. If we present unworthy men for consideration, do not vote for them. If we vote for them, it is our responsibility, not yours. I say this in all kindness. I think I may appeal to the Senator and his colleagues that we at least be considered in our manhood and not in our infancy. We certainly do not consider that side of the Chamber in this light. You managed your affairs when you had the majority. You say now we have not the majority, and I desire just for a moment to reply to what was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on that point.

He said this morning that many persons whose opinions were to be considered did not believe that we had a right to organize because of the fact that we had not a majority of Senators here. I believe that was substantially what the Senator said. If we do organize the Senate, it shows that we have a majority; if we fail to organize it, it shows that we have not a majority. How are majorities ascertained except by the roll? There is no other way. If the Senate stands a tie so far as the Senators themselves are concerned in numbers, then by virtue of the Constitution it is provided that that knot shall be untied by the voice of the presiding officer of the Senate of the United States; and, sir, if it was not so provided this Senate might stand locked day after day, week after week, and month after month. If there is any reason for any man to say that such a knot in the Senate cannot be untied by the voice of the Vice-President, I should like to know the reason. The reason is all the other way. If reasonable men make a constitution providing a body for the purpose of legislating for the country, they will certainly provide in that instrument that legislation may go on; and if you announce the doctrine that legislation may not go on because the Senate is tied and the Vice-President must sit there voiceless so far as a decision is concerned, you provide then by your Constitution a way by which you may not legislate, and not a way by which you can legislate.

Hence I say the provision of the Constitution is a wise one and the precedents which we have before us are numerous in fact that the Vice-President has untied the Senate in the election of officers of the Senate. I read one the other day. Senators will find, if they examine the precedents, that the Senate was again untied by Vice-President Fillmore under exactly such circumstances. When the Senate was a tie in reference to the election of an officer of the Senate he voted to untie the Senate, for the reason that there is no means by which legislation can proceed where there is a tie, except by the exercise of that right of the Vice-President, who sits as President of the Senate. That much I say merely in answer to the Senator from Ohio.

Now, Mr. President, let us proceed in order and organize the Senate. The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] says we seek to disorganize it. Why, sir, the disorganization he speaks of is not disorganizing the Senate; it is merely changing the officers of the Senate, which we have a right to do at any time when we have the numerical strength to do it. Having that strength——

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Illinois. I ask him if there are any charges of inefficiency against the present officers of the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. Any charges?

Mr. BUTLER. Any charges of inefficiency as a reason for their removal?

Mr. LOGAN. Why, Mr. President, no. I will only act toward the Senator as he has acted toward me, and ask him, were there any charges of inefficiency against the officers that you turned out two years ago when you put these in their places? No, sir. That is not the question. The question is, have we the power to change them? If we have, we have the right. That is all there is in it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to know when it was in the history of the Government that this thing ever was done under the same circumstances as now proposed; when it was that at an executive session called as this has been, for the purpose of considering such communications as the Executive might feel disposed to send to this body, it went into the business of a complete and radical reorganization?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator. I have not examined the precedents to know whether or not this was done in an executive session. I listened only yesterday morning to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who piled precedent on precedent to show that legislative business had been done at executive sessions. It is not a question whether the change of officers has been made in an executive session heretofore. The question is, have we the right and the power to do it? The Senate, as well as the Senator from Florida, for he is a good lawyer, knows that under our Constitution the Senate of the United States is a continuous body. It is the Senate in legislative session; it is the Senate in executive session; it is the same organization, the same body, the same power, having control of itself at all times; having control of its organization and its officers every day, every hour, every minute that it has an existence when it is in session. That is the Senate of the United States, and that is its power under the Constitution.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to put an interrogatory to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GARLAND. I give way.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose the Secretary of the Senate should resign to-day, would there be any impropriety in proceeding to an election? Would it not be our duty to proceed to an election? And suppose the result should be a tie vote in the Senate, what would the Senator propose to do?

Mr. LOGAN. Adjourn. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator wants an answer, I suppose.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to know what the Senator from Florida would propose to do if the misfortune should fall upon the Senate of having its worthy and efficient Secretary resign to-day?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We would elect a new one.

Mr. DAWES. How would you do it if the Senate, proceeding in pursuance of just such a resolution as is now pending, should find the result to be a tie vote?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Secretary of the Senate were to die or resign there would certainly be a very pressing necessity to put somebody in his place; but I cannot for the life of me see the analogy between that case and the existing one, because we have already, as is admitted on all hands, a very efficient and capable officer now filling the place.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator think that would alter the Constitution?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. Then I infer——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not raise any question as to the power. I do not raise any question as to the mere naked power; but there are many cases where power exists and where propriety forbids its exercise.

Mr. GARLAND. I would yield further, but I am afraid the Senate will adjourn before I get a chance to say something about this matter. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas resumes the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to say a few words, Mr. President, on the motion submitted by the Senator from Tennessee. Before I do that, however, I wish to say in reference to the power that is claimed for the Vice-President to cast his vote when the Senate is equally divided, that I have not a particle of doubt as to the power of the Vice-President to do that. I think it is one of the most clearly conferred powers in the Constitution of the United States and one of the wisest provisions in that very wise instrument, and given for the express purpose of untying the Senate when it is in the predicament it is now. I shall not attempt to debate it, but if it becomes a question to be talked about I shall have something to say and shall give the reasons at length for this position. I believe, in other words, that whenever the Senate shall be equally divided, the Vice-President, under the Constitution, becomes quoad hoc a Senator; in other words again, he is a latent Senator, only waked up for action whenever any question whatsoever comes before the Senate on which they are equally divided.

As to the procedure that is asked for here, the election of new officers for the Senate, my impression is—I do not state it with the utmost confidence, however—that it has not been the custom of the Senate at what is called an executive session to change its officers. It has done so at extra sessions of Congress as a matter of course, and for good reason; but so far as my knowledge goes the existing officers at the close of a Congress have always continued through an executive session following it as they existed at the session preceding that executive session. If I am in error about this, the Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of these resolutions can correct me.

But I wish to say something to the Senate now that goes beyond and above the mere matter of party discipline in this controversy, that goes far beyond the mere question of party power and party success. I assert it as a fact that I think cannot be successfully controverted, that until last Monday week there were not half a dozen men on the face of the earth who knew for a certainty what the complexion of this Senate would be, the Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate thrown in. I may be in error as to that; but I assert with a considerable degree of confidence that until last Monday a week ago it was not known what would be the complexion of this Senate in casting its vote on any proposition. Upon the revealing of that fact and its way and manner, I have nothing to say. These are matters that gentlemen must take care of for themselves with a proper regard to their own constituency and their accountability to them. The mixtures and intermixtures of politics and of political bedfellows, as was said by my friend from Texas, are like the verdicts of petit juries, among the unaccountable things, and life is too short to undertake now, at least on my part, to make out any true diagnosis or prognosis of the matter; but here is the fact before us that a large number of gentlemen, officials of this Senate, who are acceptable, against not one of whom, as I believe, can one single charge be brought, either of malfeasance or misfeasance or non-feasance in office, upon a sudden, not even a respectable justice of the peace's notice, are called upon to take their beds and walk, without a day's preparation, without a moment's notice compared with that which should be assigned to them when they are called upon to leave these places. These gentlemen have been here now nearly a period of two years, many of them depending for every particle of bread (and salt in that bread) that they have upon the small salary they get here; and they are called upon suddenly to leave, without any preparation, without anywhere to go, like the Son of Man, who it was said in the Scripture "Hath not where to lay His head;" and this at a short executive session, called by the President for special executive business.

If my friend from Illinois alluded to the change of these officers two years since, there is no comparison at all between the cases. When the Senate met here on that occasion, it was distinctly known in every corner of the United States what the majority on this side was and would be on the roll-call; it was known after the election that preceded the assembling of Congress the preceding winter, so that Mr. Gorham, Mr. French, and those officials then here had due and timely notice and preparation to leave these places. Now I appeal to both sides of the Chamber—I am not speaking of party now at all, but I am speaking for these gentlemen who have demeaned themselves as faithful servants—do not inflict an injury on some of these gentlemen and probably an irreparable injury upon them for life. It is a matter of but a few days at best; and if an extra session of Congress is called, (which God in His wisdom I hope will avert as one of the calamities to the country,) you may then, so far as I am concerned, have full leave and power and authority to go forward and elect your officers; but you are now to strike down some of the best officials the country has ever had for a little gain of possibly a week or two or a few months at most.

It is not seriously, my brother Senators, a subject worthy of your consideration; it is not a subject worthy of your action at this time. If these men could have known what was revealed here last Monday week, a month or two months or six months in advance, it would have been a different thing; and under the precedents as far as I have examined them, or as far as I have been told of them, if you organize according to your own notions next December no subsequent executive session will cut you out of the officers then elected, but they will continue.

Now let us see if there is not something decent and respectable left at last, irrespective of party discipline and party whip, where we may meet together on a common ground and let this matter go over until the regular session as indicated by the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. I do not wish to be drawn into a contest of this sort here. I do not, for the sake of the country, for the sake of all parties, for the sake of all peoples, want to have this contest, and I ask you, in the name of justice to these gentlemen who have had this short notice, to spare them, to give them a little more time. It is not, as the Senator from Illinois says, (if he will allow me to differ with him,) simply because you have the power you have the right to exercise it.

> Oh! it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

I have taken leave, Mr. President, to say this much, and with this I expect to say no more on the subject.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not know how many Federal officers there are in the United States; I have heard it said about one hundred thousand. There are about nine million voters in the United States. Of that nine million the republican party of the United States do not vote one-half. The republican party of the United States have nearly all the Federal offices of the United States. There is now and then a democratic postmaster; possibly some other democrat occasionally in office, but it will not be denied that the great body of the offices are now held by republicans.

Two years ago when the Senate was reorganized the democrats had 11 majority. At that time the republicans had nearly all the offices in the gift of the different heads of Departments of the Union. What was then the conduct of the democratic Senate? If the publications that I see be correct—and I take it they are—the democratic Senate retained in office almost one-half of the officers who are now in office and were then in office under the authority of the Senate. In other words, nearly one-half of the officers of the Senate to-day and those under them I understand to be republicans retained in position by a democratic Senate. Why? Because they were efficient and faithful the proscriptive rule was not applied. Good men in office were retained here; not all the good men who were in office, but a number of them.

We have heard a great deal said about civil-service reform. The retiring President rounded some beautiful periods on that subject in his last message. The present distinguished gentleman who occupies the executive chair of the Union in his inaugural, I believe, referred to the same subject. I understand it to be a very well established rule, at least so far as the professions of the republican party are concerned, that civil-service reform should prevail, that good men in office should not be retired simply on account of political opinions. It is admitted by distinguished Senators that the present officers of the Senate are good men; they are capable men; they can stand a competitive examination anywhere; they would be ready for a competitive examination if you desired it. Why, then, when you have nearly one-half the officers of the Senate, should you be impatient to take the balance? Is it quite liberal? Under the circumstances just referred to by my honorable friend from Arkansas, is it just to these gentlemen? I think not.

I have said that the republican party of the United States is not sustained by the votes of a majority of the voters of the United States. If I am right in that, then it would seem that a popular minority would not under a proper civil-service-reform rule be entitled to all the offices? Am I right?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me? I suppose when he refers to the number of votes he refers to the number of votes that were counted, not to the number of voters in the United States?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I refer to the number of votes that were counted. I presume there were some not counted, possibly in more sections than one. There was certainly some fraud in the elections in more sections than one. False count, if there has been any, or fraud in votes, or the use of money to control votes, is not confined to one section of this Union.

In 1876 the democratic candidate, Mr. Tilden, received on the popular vote for the office of President 4,284,885 votes; Mr. Hayes, the republican candidate, received 4,033,950 votes; being a popular majority for Mr. Tilden over Mr. Hayes of 250,935 votes, a quarter of a million difference in favor of the man who was counted out as the defeated candidate. At that election Mr. Cooper, the candidate of the greenback party, received 81,740 votes; the prohibition candidate received 9,522; there were scattering 2,636 votes, making an aggregate of 93,898 greenback, prohibition, and scattering votes. Add those to the votes that the republican candidate for President received, and Mr. Tilden, the democratic candidate, still had a popular majority over all of 128,519 votes. Thus the popular voice was uttered in 1876.

How did it stand in 1880? According to the American Almanac Mr. Garfield, the candidate of the republican party, received in 1880 4,442,950 votes; General Hancock, the candidate of the democratic party, received 4,442,035 votes, being a majority for Garfield over Hancock of 915 votes. At that election the greenback candidate received 306,867 votes. There were scattering 12,576, making a greenback vote and a scattering vote, added together, of 319,443 votes. The aggregate vote cast was 9,204,428. Mr. Garfield lacked 159,264 votes of receiving a majority of the whole number of votes cast in the United States for President.

Thus the republican party to-day holds its power by a minority vote of the people of the United States. Then it would seem to be proper, as the two parties are so nearly balanced, less than a thousand of the popular vote between the two parties, that if we were to apply an honest, fair, civil-service rule, the democrats ought to have some of the offices. There are about four and a half million democratic voters in the United States. Except, as I have said, a few postmasters, and now and then one who has strayed into the camp, under a mistake probably of the appointing power, you have on the republican side nearly all the offices, amounting to about one hundred thousand. We have a few officers still holding over under the authority of the House of Representatives, and about one-half, or a little over one-half, of the officers and employés of the Senate, and now you covet the little balance that are here.

But let it be borne in mind that not only the two parties on the popular vote are about equal in the United States, but that the pop ular vote is fairly and honestly reflected in the Senate of the United States, and to-day the two parties stand exactly balanced in this body. We have thirty-seven republican Senators and thirty-seven democratic Senators; we have one independent and one readjuster, as General MAHONE terms himself, and I prefer that he speak for himself.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, so that I may understand him? I do not wish to debate this matter, because I see where that would lead, and I certainly wish to avoid that; but I should like to understand the Senator's position. I ask if he is stating his own position, or whether he is trying to state the position which has been taken by the republican party when he says that the offices should be divided? What I mean is, is that his own position?

Mr. BROWN. That is my own position, that under civil-service reform, if you were to be honest about it, you should make a division. That is exactly my position.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a question as to whether we are honest.

Mr. BROWN. I do not mean personal honesty; I mean political honesty.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand you. Is it your position that because of the fact that the presidential election according to the popular vote was decided by so close a vote, therefore the offices of the Government should be divided between the respective parties?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, I do not hold any such position; I was simply commenting on your civil-service idea that has been made so prominent by two of your Presidents; and I say if that rule is to prevail there ought to be a fair competitive examination, and in that examination I say that the democrats will often win, and it is fair that the four and a half millions of democrats of the Union should have some chance for office, and if you will not hold competitive examinations and we have a little squad left here, we should hold them and stay here till we do hold them.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I wish right here to put in as a parenthesis that so far as I am concerned——

Mr. BROWN. I do not object to the Senator asking questions, but I do object to having his speeches injected into mine or taking up any length of time. He can reply to me when I have done. I have the floor. I will yield for a question, but I will not yield for comments.

Mr. LOGAN. I will not comment; I want to ask a proper question and let the Senator answer it as either on the republican side or his own. According to the theory he now presents to the country, saying that is the republican theory—I do not agree with him, but that is immaterial—if the offices are to be divided upon that principle, then the President of the United States would have to put in one-half his Cabinet republican, or we will say within one of half republicans and within one of half democrats and probably the other one independent. [Laughter.] That is the theory. Do you believe that course would harmonize anything in this country?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, I do not. I think there is a great deal of humbug in your theory, but you ought to be bound by it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not believe in any such theory myself.

Mr. BROWN. Neither do I. I do not know but that there was more good sense in the position taken by an old gentleman who once I believe occupied the Presidency, that "to the victors belong the spoils," and I thus judge because you republicans in office have practiced it, and you have done it for twenty years pretty successfully. Though two of your Presidents, it is true, have said a great deal about the theory of civil-service reform and competitive examinations, I say there is humbug in the doctrine, and the practice shows that it is humbug. You do not practice it; you will not allow us to practice it. We are ready for competitive examinations now; not on Cabinet officers, because the President should always choose his own advisers; not on heads of Departments; I say the party in power should have the direction so far as leading positions are concerned so as not to be embarrassed; but when you come to apply it to the minor officers such as we have in the Senate, clerkships and positions of that character, if there is any propriety in the theory of what is called civil-service reform, or if it means anything, you should permit a competitive examination once in a while and let a democrat take a chance. Again, when you have good officers as you have here in the Senate now, and nearly half of them on your side, you are tolerably grasping I think if you do not permit us to hold them at least until you meet for a business session.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one other question?

Mr. BROWN. I do not care how many questions the Senator asks. I would prefer, however, to go on with my remarks.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to ask——

Mr. BROWN. I understand the object of the questions very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether you do or not. Perhaps you will after I ask it.

Mr. BROWN. I understand it just as well now.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator please state, if he is so minded—I have no right to interrogate him unless he desires to be interrogated—whether or not he carried out the policy he is now suggesting to us at the time he was a republican governor of the State of Georgia?

Mr. BROWN. I will. I answer distinctly that I never was a republican governor of the State of Georgia.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I take it all back. I thought the Senator was.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; never.

Mr. LOGAN. I remember meeting him in a republican national convention as a delegate when General Grant was nominated, and I recollect that he advocated General Grant's nomination and voted for him.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; and I voted for him.

Mr. LOGAN. I thought he was a republican. I take it all back if he was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I will answer the Senator without any hesitation at all. When the democratic party stood upon the platform that it occupied prior to the war and whenever it has stood upon the platform it occupies to-day, I have never in any case been anything but a democrat or voted anything but a democratic ticket. When it abandoned its former platform, or the platform that it occupied prior to the war, and adopted the line that the reconstruction measures were unconstitutional, null, and void, which I thought would lead to another revolution and trouble, I then did not act with the democracy; and as I am always on one side or the other I acted with the republicans, because they accepted the results of the war. But as soon as the democrats came and planted themselves on that platform, and I believed planted themselves there in good faith, I returned to my first love and acted with them, as I had a right to do.

Now I will ask my friend from Illinois, who I believe was once a very good democrat [laughter]—he lived in the Egypt part of his State, which was very democratic—whether it might not probably be well for him now as his old party has accepted these results to come and act with it?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator if he will allow me. When I left the democratic party I left it not to return. I left it because I disbelieved its theories. I disbelieve them still. I stay away from them still. There has been no time since I left them that ever I had, as the boys say, a hankering for returning. I have it not yet. I am always, as the Senator says of himself, on one side or the other, and since I have left the democratic party I have always been with the republican side, and I always expect to remain there as long as the republicans advocate what they do. There is no first love with me to return to. I have no affection for the principles of the democratic party that attracts me in any sense whatever, and if the Senator from Georgia when he abandoned the democratic party and joined the republican party because he thought they were right had staid there because he thought they were right, and had not abandoned them because the democratic party as he says returned to their old principles, he and I would understand one another much better as to our different changes, he having changed once oftener than I have. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Illinois admits, then, that while he acted originally with the democratic party he did not believe in their principles. I did. That is the difference between us. I do not know what policy may have controlled him. Doubtless he was always controlled by honest motives; I do not question that; but whether it was because he was in a congressional district that was strongly democratic, or what his reason might have been, I do not know. He says that though he acted with the democracy he did not like their tenets and never had any love for them. I do not blame him, therefore, for not returning to them. If I had had no affection for the party when I acted with it prior to the war, when it strayed off on a false issue and I did not go with it and acted that time with the republicans, I would have done like he did; I would not have returned to it. But as I had a sincere affection for it and acted with it upon principle, and have always acted upon principle, when I thought it put itself right again upon the reconstruction measures and took a position for the best interests of the country, I returned to it, or rather I should say it returned to me.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not wish to misrepresent what I said?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly I do not.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say I never had any affection for it; I said I never had any affection sufficiently strong to cause me to go back to it. I say that now; and I will say another thing to the Senator, that perhaps will show a little difference between him and me at the time I left the democratic party. It is not necessary for me to go into that, and I do not wish to; I have gone into it often enough and I presume the Senator has. I left it when my State was a democratic State; I left it when my congressional district had 18,000 democratic majority, and I was elected to Congress by 18,000 majority as a democrat. I resigned my seat and left it when I was in the minority. So it shows that I did not leave it for power or place.

Mr. BROWN. I have not questioned your motives at all.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator, when his State was democratic, when there was not a republican majority in it at the time, had joined the republicans and staid there after he changed to be a republican, instead of changing to be a democrat again when the State did, he and I would stand exactly alike; but inasmuch as his changes and mine have been a little different under different circumstances, we do not stand exactly alike. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is simply mistaken again, as he was when he spoke of me as a republican governor. When I left the democratic party, or it left me, I left it with a majority in Georgia. I did exactly as he did. I left the party which had a majority because for the time I thought the minority occupied the right position. When the majority came back to that position, I again acted with the majority as I had done before. So the difference the Senator attempts to draw simply grows out of a mistake of facts upon which he was not well informed.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think our former history is very interesting anyhow.

Mr. BROWN. Possibly it is not, but I believe the Senator introduced it.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted and drawn off by this digression, I was discussing the impropriety of the majority in this Senate—and I count the Senator from Virginia and the Vice-President to make that majority—pressing this resolution to reorganize the Senate and turn out the few remaining democrats we have here in office when those few remaining democrats and those in the House are almost the only representatives in office now of four and a half million voters. In this state of the case, whether there is any sincerity or propriety in civil-service reform, or whether the whole of it is a humbug, I do think there would be propriety in the Senators on that side not pressing this change at this time, especially as I am told the precedents, with probably not more than a single exception if there be one, are that there has never been a reorganization of this sort pressed at an executive session where it discharged the officers of one party and put in those of another; and I understand in the instance where it was done, probably in 1853, it did not change the political complexion of the officers.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Only one officer was then elected.

Mr. BROWN. And, as the Senator from Florida says, there was only a single officer elected then. Why is it, then, that you are so impatient for the sacrifice? The parties are equally divided; we have as many votes here as you have, and you can simply carry it at all because you carry the vote of the Senator from Virginia with you.

I do not pretend to make any charges here, for I know no fact that justifies it; but everybody knows that the air is full of rumors of bargain, contract, "capital understanding," and all that. I do not know whether any exists or not, but the very fact that you are so impatient to sacrifice these few remaining democratic officers and put others in who are not regular democrats and who are the special friends of the Senator from Virginia, and other facts stated in reference to their connection with the Senator who now controls the Senate, surely lead us to think it would be better to pause awhile. The country will inquire, naturally, why is this change made in this way, and the response will have to be given. A great many people in the country think that there is an understanding between you and the Senator from Virginia by which he is to have the patronage of the Government in Virginia. I do not say it is so. A great many outside believe that there is an arrangement by which you are to reorganize at this time and give the offices, or part of them at least, to his friends. I do not know whether that is true or not. Those are questions that are prominently discussed every day before the public, and great injustice may be done. I do not know anything about it, but I say that I think it will be better for the interest of all concerned, and it would appear better before the country under all these circumstances, that we delay this matter for the present; that we should not hurry up this organization. You might do great injustice to the Senator from Virginia by causing a great many people to believe that there had been some understanding of this sort when possibly there is none, if you hurry up the organization in this way and put his friends into the offices here.

There is another point that I wish to call attention to, and then I shall have said all I care to say now. My friend from Texas referred to the fact that a great deal was said two years ago and during the last two years about confederate brigadiers having control of the democratic side of the House, the democratic side controlling the Senate, and therefore the confederate brigadiers controlling the Senate. I have no taste for any of these matters. The war is over; we have had fifteen years' time to reconstruct, and I think I am pretty thoroughly reconstructed. I will make no issues with you here in reference to any of the reconstruction measures. I have accepted them in honest, good faith. It was on that question that I differed with my party at the time referred to by the honorable Senator from Illinois. I still accept them. I have never said that I supposed there had been no wrongs perpetrated in the South in reference to ballots or votes. There have been in all sections of the Union. I say I oppose such wrongs, come from what quarter they may. I am for a free ballot and a fair count; I am for carrying out the constitutional amendments in letter and in spirit in good faith. On that point I was a little at variance once with the democratic party; but when they met in convention at Saint Louis, Missouri, they there reaffirmed their devotion to the Constitution of the United States, with the amendments, and they thereby accepted them to the fullest extent.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there? The convention that met at Saint Louis denounced the reconstruction acts as unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void.

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is thinking of the convention that met at New York at the time Mr. Seymour was nominated.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that was one of them.

Mr. BROWN. That is the time I did not act with the democratic party. My friend is in error about his facts again.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps I was wrong about the particular democratic platform; but that declaration was in one.

Mr. BROWN. I say I accept in the fullest good faith the reconstruction measures, and I want this war to be over; I desire to see sectional strife ended; and whenever it is necessary to vote on that question, whether with or not with my party, I shall vote in favor of burying the issues of the dead past; but while that is done, as a democrat I think my party has some rights, and I am prepared to stand by those rights, and probably——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I have no objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator stated a moment ago that he was glad that the country had been reconstructed. So am I; and the best evidence of it is what has occurred here within the past few days.

Mr. BROWN. I was coming to that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I beg leave to inject just a few words into the Senator's speech, which is a much abler one than I can make, I know. I want to say now, and I want the Senator to understand and I want the country to understand, that while we concede the gentlemen who are here in position to be good and proper men, we think we have just as good and proper men, and we propose to put them in. It seems to be a question of endurance; and being so we may as well "sit it out" now.

Mr. BROWN. Well, we will try and see whether we can endure as long as you can on this issue. We feel that we are right about it; we feel that you have now nearly all the officers of the Union and a minority of the voters of the Union, and we feel that it is our duty to stand by the few we have left, and let me tell you now we intend to do it and we accept the issue that is tendered, if it is a question of endurance. I do not say they are not as good on your side, but I say you have nearly half of them now, and if you seek the balance, no matter what motive may prompt you, we do not consent that you shall have them. Your party has won by standing boldly up to its office-holders. Divest you of your one hundred thousand offices and your party will sink to insignificance. If the democrats yield and permit you wrongfully to turn out our office-holders, we shall cease to command the respect of the country and soon increase your majority. No party can succeed that fails to stand by its friends. We sat here for nearly two weeks trying to go forward with the business for which the President had called us together; you declined to go on with the business or to permit the organization of committees, without which we could not proceed, and you filibustered to prevent it. We, as democrats in this Hall, were ready every moment to go forward and do the business the republican President had called us here to do; you declined until you could fill your vacancies, and with the aid of the Senator from Virginia could get matters in shape to control the committees. Now you have the committees. The reorganization of the offices of the Senate is in no way necessary to the business of the Senate or the session, and you propose now that it shall be a question of endurance whether you reorganize them. Well, we say, we will endure with you. We are ready at every moment to go into executive session and do the proper business of the session, the business which you said on that side yesterday was the only proper business to be done. If you are not ready to do that, then we will invite you to adjourn, and if you will not adjourn, we will invite you to go back to the business for which you were called together by your President, and we will continue that operation until we see justice done to the few remaining democrats. We may be here to June; we have till December.

But I was again called off from the line of thought I was pursuing on reconstruction and fraternal relations at the time my friend from Pennsylvania interrupted me. There are some good features about this movement. Whether it be true or not that there has been any arrangement made with the Senator from Virginia, whether it be true that you are bound to give him some of these positions or not, I do not know; whether the rumor be true that he is to have the control of the Federal patronage of Virginia, I do not know; but one thing I do know——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I cannot permit Senators on the other side to continue to interrupt me. I shall be through my remarks in a few minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I thought perhaps my friend——

Mr. BROWN. I do not yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I want to get through with my remarks. I said there was one good point about it. It shows that we have reached a period where no more will be said about confederate brigadiers. It seems to show that the Union is in fact reconstructed, that sectional issues are dead, and we have reached that point now, I suppose, that is spoken of by a very old and a very venerable book where it says: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them." We have now reached the period when the lion of debt-paying republicanism and the lamb of readjustment or of partial repudiation have lain down in loving embrace together in green pastures of luxuriant richness. I will not say that a little child or a little general shall lead them; but a gallant confederate general shall lead them, and you all on that side have to hold your positions as chairmen of your respective committees and your patronage at the breath of his nostrils, for he can unseat you any moment he pleases. Therefore I hope the day has come when we have bridged the bloody chasm, and when we shall fold up that old bloody shirt that we have heard so much about and bury it beneath the reach of resurrection.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the resolution before the Senate cannot prevail unless it commands the majority of votes in the Senate. It is admitted upon the other side that that is not only a constitutional majority, but that it was wisely provided for. The complaint is that there is undue haste in submitting that resolution to a vote of the majority. I understand that without that element of undue haste there would be no objection to it. The Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Arkansas, and the Senator from Georgia each says that if in due time, with proper consideration and after sufficient notice for preparation, a majority vote upon that resolution should prevail, they would offer no objection. It is proper, therefore, to look at this question of undue haste and to look at it in the line of precedents, to hold it up as a mirror to our friends on the other side and see how it looks to them.

Two years ago upon the 4th of March the democratic party acquired a majority in this body. That majority was secured to the democratic party by the elections of one-third of the members of this body which took place between the 1st of January and the 4th of March of that year. When those elections took place in the several Legislatures it became apparent that the democratic party had secured that majority. They came into power on the 4th day of March, 1879. On the 24th day of March of that year a Senator on the democratic side offered a resolution in this body in the very words of the pending resolution. It could have been carried over by a single objection. Its consideration obtained unanimous consent from this side of the Chamber. Senators on this side recognized the fact that it was worth while to determine then and there by a majority of the Senate whether it was proper to elect new officers. This side of the Senate indeed urged upon the body, what was admitted on the other side, that all the incumbents were good, faithful, efficient, worthy men. They went out of office that day carrying with them the certificate to that effect of the other side of the Chamber. We appealed to them in vain, urging the merits of those officers, but we offered no delay. We submitted to the majority of the Senate, with such earnestness as was in our power, considerations very much like those urged upon the majority to-day by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Georgia; but other considerations in their minds prevailed and were of greater weight for the public good, as it seemed to them and the proprieties of the organization and a new course of officers here, over the fact that they were efficient men. The resolution offered on the 24th day of March, 1879, passed on that very day, although a single objection would have carried it over.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to call his attention to the fact that on the 24th day of March, 1879, the two Houses of Congress were in regular session, having been convened by the Executive for general legislative business, unlike the present session, the Senate then not having been convened in executive session for the performance of such duties as devolve wholly upon an executive session?

Mr. DAWES. If the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee throw any light upon this question, I should be obliged to him——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to proceed?

Mr. HARRIS. That is a statement of fact the Senator from Massachusetts was careful not to mention.

Mr. DAWES. It never occurred to me before that the propriety of electing an officer of this body depended upon whether there was a session of the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol. I am indebted to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for that idea.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to increase the obligation by stating another fact?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me to have the floor, I will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly shall.

Mr. DAWES. Unless the Senator desires to make some correction in anything I have stated?

Mr. HARRIS. I wished simply to state an additional fact that I thought somewhat pertinent to this question.

Mr. DAWES. Nothing could be so pertinent to the question whether it is proper to have a Secretary of the Senate as to inquire whether there is a session of the House of Representatives! I admit that.

But I was going on to say that a resolution precisely like the one here pending passed the day it was offered two years ago, and immediately thereupon a resolution precisely like the one pending here in reference to a Secretary passed upon the same day it was offered, and so through to the end of the list. In one day all the officers of the Senate were changed, the outgoing ones carrying from the other side a certificate of their efficiency, good character, and gentlemanly deportment toward all the members of this body. The majority, actuated by what was to them a higher consideration of duty, bore down upon them one and all upon one day. That day was the 24th day of March, this very day two years ago, just after the democratic party had secured power in this body.

In the election of one-third of this body between the 1st day of last January and the 4th day of March the democratic party failed to secure a majority of the Senate precisely as they succeeded in doing it two years before. When the Legislatures of the several States electing new members to this body had made their choice, it was just as certain that the democratic party had failed to secure that majority then as it is to-day. In no single State sending a new Senator here on the 4th of March was there a particle of question that the democratic organization as represented on the other side of the Senate had failed to secure a majority of the Senate. There was no doubt about it. Clearly and distinctly in every one of the Legislatures was the line drawn between what is known as the democratic organization in this body and those opposed to it. Senators seem to express a doubt themselves, a doubt that existed in no Legislature that had the duty of electing a Senator to take his seat here on the 4th of March. In every one of those Legislatures the line was drawn between what is the democratic organization here and those opposed to it, and the democratic organization failed to keep its majority in the Senate. They met here on the 4th day of March without that majority; with what the Senator from Arkansas and all Senators on that side admit is a constitutional majority, wisely, as he says, and properly constituted on purpose for such an occasion against them. That was the 4th of March of this year.

On the 24th day of March this year, precisely the day of the month and just so many days this year as intervened between the 4th day of March two years ago, (it is the 24th day of March to-day,) the question is submitted to that majority to-day, just as it was on the 24th day of March two years ago, to which those not in the majority two years ago offered no other objection than that founded in fair and candid argument submitted to the judgment of the majority. Coming here exactly in point of time, exactly in point of power, and exactly with that power as clearly defined to-day as it was two years ago, the constitutional majority submits precisely the same resolution that it submitted then, and is met here with the announcement on the other side that without regard to merit, without regard to precedent, without regard to anything else but the question of endurance, they will oppose it by dilatory motions to the end. That is the position of this matter. That is the comparison between the action here to-day of those who do not control the majority of the Senate and the action submitted by them two years ago to this side, when this side had not the majority in the Senate. There is no difference in circumstances; there is no other difference except in the manner in which questions are met here on this floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to postpone the consideration of the pending resolution until the first Monday of December, on which the yeas and nays have been asked for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish before the vote is taken to say one word, which I feel constrained to do by what has fallen from the lips of the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] whom I do not now see in his seat. If I understood him, he gave notice that it was his purpose, and the purpose of those who agree with him, to occupy the time of this body from now until the 1st of December in alternating two motions, one to adjourn and one to go into executive session, to prevent the expression of the will of the constitutional majority of this body in regard to the selection of its executive officers. I regard that declaration as containing the very essence of revolution and treason to the institutions of this country.

There have been instances very numerous elsewhere, some instances here, of what is called filibustering in order to obtain what the minority deemed a reasonable and proper delay in regard to the action of the Senate or the House upon pending measures by motions of this class; but this has been the first time in the history of this country that any gentleman sustaining the character of a Senator of the United States has declared that the will which should finally and to the end govern the Senate of the United States should be the will of a minority and not of a majority of its members. There have been declarations, abandoned by the men who uttered them, that the opinion of one branch of the Government should govern the other branch, that the opinion of the House should govern the Senate or the opinion of the Senate should govern the President, or otherwise the Government should stop; but no considerable number of gentlemen was found to adhere to that declaration in the face of any considerable discussion.

Now what is the thing in regard to which this demand for delay and for consideration and for postponement of action till the 1st of next December comes? With the exception of the mere formal motion to proceed to a vote, the question is whether Mr. George C. Gorham or the present incumbent shall hold the office of Secretary of the Senate of the United States. That is the first practical question on the list of motions of which my colleague has given notice; and is it pretended that any gentleman in this body wants delay for six months to enable him to consider and to inquire into that question? Every gentleman on the other side of the Chamber except four voted upon the precise question of the comparative merits of these two candidates for Secretary two years ago. They had all the time for the consideration of that proposition that they desired, fixing their own time, and they proceeded to vote, differing with this side of the Chamber, that on the whole the present incumbent was a fitter person for Secretary than Mr. Gorham, and having had, most of them, an opportunity to know Mr. Gorham's qualification by having served in the Senate for many years while he was holding the office of Secretary, after the choice, having attested their opinion of the worth of the present Secretary by voting for him, I believe they proceeded to place upon the Journal of the Senate their opinion also as to the character and capacity and worth as an officer of Mr. Gorham when he went out. But four democratic Senators have come into this Chamber, one from West Virginia, one from Alabama, one from Maryland, and one from Tennessee, since those two votes were recorded.

Gentlemen do not even bring this matter up to the dignity of a joke when they profess that this procrastination is for any purpose of enabling them to inquire into the merits of the resolution upon which they are invited to act. There is not a gentleman on that side of the Chamber, new Senator or old Senator, who will not admit readily that he has thoroughly made up his mind upon the merits of that question and the way he shall vote upon it.

It is therefore nothing else than a doctrine affirmed by the honorable Senator from Georgia, for the first time in the history of this country, that he means that the Senate of the United States shall not act any longer by a constitutional majority. Gentlemen of course reconcile such a position as that with an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, though by a process of reasoning which I have never heard and which I cannot conjecture, that the Senate of the United States shall not elect its own officers, because the Senator from Georgia thinks it will be well that among the offices of this country a certain portion shall be assigned to the democrats. Suppose he is right; is not that a fair question of difference of opinion; and whose opinion is to determine whether any democrat, or how many democrats, or what democrats, shall be assigned to any offices or what offices?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in that connection? I wish to know if it is not even now a matter about which Senators may fairly differ, notwithstanding the record made up in the past, as to the right of the Vice-President to cast a vote in a case of this kind?

Mr. HOAR. That question will be settled when the right of the Vice-President is brought in question. I suppose the honorable Senator from Florida does not expect to determine that question in any other way except by the vote of the majority of this body. He will find it hard I think to rally a very compact democratic column to a change of the doctrine affirmed by Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Benton, and all the great lights of that day of the democratic party as to the right of the Vice-President to vote in whatever mode the Senate acts when it is equally divided. As the Constitution provided that the Senate should be a body composed of even numbers, when those numbers are evenly divided the Vice-President is entitled to cast his vote; otherwise that particular act must be stricken out from the constitutional powers of the Senate.

But I was dealing with another question. I say that the honorable Senator from Georgia has in my judgment affirmed the most unconstitutional doctrine, full of treason in substance, ever uttered within the walls of this Chamber by the lips of any Senator, when he declares in reference to any act which the Constitution of this country commits to the power of the Senate, as it expressly does the power to elect its own officers, that the Senate shall never be permitted to proceed to take action unless it will assent to act as he and his associates in the minority think it should. The doctrine which his party took for a few moments and abandoned at the close of the last Congress but one, that it was in the power of one branch of the Government to constrain the will of the other branch of the Government in legislation, is a doctrine no more indefensible, no more inconsistent with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States than the doctrine upon which the Senator has just planted himself. I think on reconsideration he will hardly adhere to the utterance which we have just heard from his lips. Does the Senator mean to tell the American people that when speaking constitutionally by the voice of the States they have filled the seats of this Chamber, there is any constitutional function which one-fifth of its members have a right to say to the other four-fifths "you shall never perform an act without our assent!" If he does, it is time the parties in this country took issue upon that question.

As I said in the beginning, there are many instances, whether defensible or indefensible I do not mean to say, where reasonable delay for a day or two, or a few days, has been demanded and has been accomplished by the interposition of the practice of filibustering; but the Senator says that the Senate throughout its entire session, which can last according to law only until the first Monday of next December, if it is in session on that day, shall find us engaged in an ineffectual attempt to perform an act which the Constitution expressly commits to the power of the constitutional majority. In other words, the demand of the section of the country or of the party of which he is so conspicuous a representative is that hereafter this is to be a legislation not of a majority, not of two-thirds, but of four-fifths, and that there is no other power committed to the Senate of the United States except to do such acts as four-fifths of the body shall see fit to accomplish.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I did not have the pleasure of hearing all the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] as I had stepped out for a few moments. However, I have heard, I suppose, the substance of his remarks since my return. I rather regret that the honorable Senator has found it consistent with his sense of propriety to use some expressions that fell from him, where he states that the doctrine I announced is revolution and treason.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke of the doctrine.

Mr. BROWN. I said the doctrine that I announced.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, let me restate it. I said that the Senator undoubtedly reconciled it to his own sense of constitutional duty by some process or reasoning which I could not conjecture, but that doctrine was a doctrine as replete with revolution and treason, in my judgment, as any doctrine ever uttered within these walls.

Mr. BROWN. I am very sorry, and I say it in all personal kindness to him, that the honorable Senator has made it my duty to prove him a traitor, and yet I am obliged now to proceed to do it. I do it feeling very kindly to him. He lays down the position that filibustering or the prevention of the regular business of the session here is treasonable, as I understand him.

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. If the Senator will pardon me I wish before he proceeds with his demonstration that he shall take his premises. I said distinctly, and I now repeat, that the obtaining reasonable delay for a short time by this process had become one of our common parliamentary resources. Whether justifiable or not I did not undertake to say, but it has been practiced elsewhere, and here to some extent. But the Senator says not "you shall wait till tomorrow or next Monday until I can look into this matter;" but "this thing shall not be done until the Senate itself, so far as the present session makes a distinct Senate, dies by lapse of time." That is the distinction.

Mr. BROWN. I am still obliged to carry out my promise and prove the Senator a traitor according to his own theory as laid down. He says he does not know how a Senator can reconcile it to his oath of office to do what I say. If it be a violation of the Constitution for us to stay here and accept the challenge given us by the other side, to make the determination of this issue one of physical endurance, and to stay here until June or December, if necessary for that purpose, that is full treason I suppose; but if it be so, then how much treason is there in filibustering a week, or two weeks, or three weeks? The only trouble about my friend's position is that he did not draw the line of demarkation just where filibustering begins to be treason or where it ceases to be justifiable. He says that my statement is that we would stay here and prevent action to the end of the session. Memory is a convenient thing sometimes, and it has entirely escaped the memory of my friend from Massachusetts, I have no doubt, that he (I believe he was one of them) and his party sat here to do exactly that thing, and filibustered and refused to vote in order to prevent the transaction of certain business that was legitimately before us until the adjournment of the Senate at the end of the last Congress. The gentleman found it consistent with his oath of office, and no doubt very conscientiously, not only to interpose objections or points of order to doing things which he did not want done, but he reconciled it to his oath of office, and honestly I have no doubt sat in his seat and refused to vote when the roll was called. That seems to have been obstructing legislation.

Mr. HOAR. The honorable Senator will let me ascertain his facts. The honorable Senator has been very careless in obtaining his facts if he finds that I am the person to whom he referred.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator deny that he did sit in his seat here before the end of the Forty-sixth Congress and refuse to vote on questions that were brought up where there was a party end in view?

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to be understood as admitting that any action of that kind was like what the Senator has avowed his purpose to do.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that the gentleman denies that that is treason, or that he is a traitor who does it, yet he says we are traitors if we do it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will be good enough to hear my answer.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator asked whether I denied that I did it. I do.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator deny that he sat in his seat when the yeas and nays were called on party questions here one night, a night or two before the termination of the Forty-sixth Congress, and refused to vote when it was necessary to make a quorum?

Mr. HOAR. On the occasion to which the Senator refers I declined to vote I think once, possibly twice.

Mr. BROWN. That was one little act of treason, then.

Mr. HOAR. I then proceeded and voted on the question as long as I remained in the Chamber.

Mr. BROWN. That I suppose we would term petty treason, it being a very small thing, only one little act of treason; therefore in that particular my friend would be only a petty traitor. But his party did it a good deal oftener than once. I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts did not. It seems he only did it once or did it a little, but the party sat here with whom he associates and did it a great many times. He is guilty of less treason than they are, according to his admission. Now I acquit the Senator by saying that I do not agree with him that he is a traitor, or I do not agree with him that it is treason.

Mr. HOAR. Will the honorable Senator permit me? I stated in the speech which I made in reply to him that more than once, whether justifiable or not, all parties in this country, I believe, certainly the party to which I belong, had accomplished their desire for a brief period of delay by refusing to vote or by motions to adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. It was only for a brief period, and therefore not treason.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator tell me how long it should have been before it commenced to be treason?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, I will tell the Senator exactly how long it would have to be. I believe it to be true, although I did not myself concur in the propriety of that particular proceeding, that some gentlemen on this side of the Chamber accomplished a night's or a day's delay very recently; but the Senator from Georgia says, not "we will accomplish such delay as is necessary to have this question properly dealt with," but he says "we will sit here forever, so far as"——

Mr. BROWN. No, I did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. So far as the term "forever" can be properly applicable to the Senate; "we will sit here till the 1st of December alternating these motions." The distinction between filibustering and treason is exactly this: filibustering is getting a little time at the demand of a minority; treason is saying the act shall never be done by a constitutional majority of the Senate if the minority refuse to do it. That is the difference, and it came in when the statement of the honorable Senator from Georgia fell from his lips, that this thing they would resist until the 1st of December. I think the Senate and the country understand the broad distinction between the two propositions.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think my friend the Senator from Massachusetts understands it, for he has been able to draw no distinction. I have asked him to draw the line of demarkation where obstruction to legislation by the minority on a political question ceases to be justifiable and commences to be treasonable. How many days, how many weeks must it be continued? I want to know where is the line of demarkation.

Mr. HOAR. The line of demarkation is between the purpose to prevent action altogether and the mere purpose to delay it.

Mr. BROWN. Then the Senator and his whole party were guilty of treason, for they sat up that night and filibustered and refused to vote, with a view of preventing action altogether until the Congress ended, and they did prevent it. Therefore I have proved my friend a traitor on his theory. I say he is not a traitor, though; but if his theory be right, then I have proved that he is a traitor, because he did it to prevent in toto the action of the Senate on a question legitimately before it where it was its duty to act. It was just before the end of the Congress, and by filibustering and sitting in their seats and refusing to vote they had it in their power to prevent the party action that we wanted to take, and they did prevent it, and it fell at the end of the Congress by the action of the Senator and his party, and never went into effect. But for this action it would have passed.

I do not call them traitors; I do not believe a word of it; but if the Senator's theory be right then I have proved by his own admissions that he is guilty of treason and that his whole party is guilty of it. He does them injustice. I have proved furthermore that they are revolutionists, because they did by those acts prevent legislation during the Forty-sixth Congress, to the end of it, which but for those acts would have been accomplished. Therefore it was revolutionary, according to his theory. I say, however, it was not so. I do not make any such charge against him or his party, but when he makes it against me and the democratic party I must turn it over and show what it proves on him and his party. If he be right, then I have proved that he is a revolutionist and is a traitor. I know he is neither, and I do not say it, but his argument leads him right there, and there is no escape from it.

At this executive session we have sat here for nearly two weeks trying every day to go on with the organization of the committees, so that we could go into executive session and legitimately transact the business that we were called here by a republican President to transact. We were called to act upon treaties and nominations. The Senator and his party sat here and refused to permit us to do it. Why? Because they had certain vacancies that they expected to have filled which with the vote of the Senator from Virginia I suppose they expected would give them the majority and enable them to take control of the committees and patronage of the Senate.

When it is necessary to accomplish an object that the republican party has in view and desires to accomplish it is no treason to filibuster, to refuse to vote or do anything you choose to prevent action; but if the democrats have an object to accomplish and they filibuster or refuse to vote, then it is revolutionary and treasonable. In my statement here I did not go beyond this session, while the Senator and his party filibustered to the end and absolutely prevented action until it fell by the expiration of the Forty-sixth Congress. We have not done that. We do not propose to do it. This Congress will last for two years. We have only proposed to stay here until the 1st of December next, rather than you shall do this great wrong which you are now attempting to do. That is not so revolutionary or treasonable as what you did, for we still leave you time during this Congress to do it; but you did not leave us time to do it, you prevented the action absolutely and it fell with the Congress, where it expired on account of the obstructions that you threw in the way. Therefore we do not propose revolution or treason, according to your theory. But you have been guilty of it if your theory is correct. I say, however, that it is not correct.

The Senator speaks very softly and mildly. I am his personal friend, and I regret to make these remarks. I do it, as he knows, in no unkind spirit; but he tells us very mildly and in persuasive tones that when it is necessary to accomplish some object a little time by filibustering or throwing in motions that stop the business for the time is justifiable, that there is no treason or revolution in that. In other words, when the republican party has a little object in view, and it takes up a couple of weeks or so with filibustering or refusing to vote, it is no treason; there is no wrong in that; but if the democrats want to save a few officers here who are about to be unjustly turned out without notice, and leave their families without bread for the time, who have been dependent upon these offices, and when a republican Senator says, "We are determined to do this thing," and it is a question of endurance, and taunts us with it, and we accept that issue, and say "Very well; we will stay here as long as you will," or "We will stay here until June, or we have till December, if necessary," that becomes treasonable. That on the republican side would be no treason; that would be all exactly right and fair. It is a little object we have to accomplish, and we are only going to do it long enough to accomplish the object, and then go along with business. If it takes only one night, all right; if it takes two weeks, all right; we will do it, but that is all there is in it. It is proper for the republicans to accomplish an object by the use of such means, but it is treasonable for the democrats to do it. We simply say we have a right to practice on the same theory that you have been practicing. We are justified in it when you were not.

The Senate had no committees until within the last few days, because you filibustered and would not permit business to be done. We could not proceed with the business for which we were called here without committees. You were not justified during that two weeks, in our estimation. Though it was not treason or revolutionary, you were not justified in obstructing the business by refusing to permit the organization of the committees, so that the business of the session could proceed.

The committees are now organized; the Senate is now fully equipped. Let us go forward with the executive business. We are ready to do it on our part. You stop all business now and tell the country that nothing more shall be done until you have possessed yourselves of the few little remaining places now held by democrats. It comes from your side. My friend the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania told us it had to be done; that was the substance of it; and it is a question of physical endurance. It is right on your side of the House to have the point carried to the fullest extent of physical endurance; but if we say we accept it on that issue and will stay here as long as you will, or until a certain time before you shall do it, that is revolution and treason, and we are asked how a democratic Senator can reconcile that to his oath to support the Constitution. It is very wrong for the democrats to do it; it is all right for the republican side.

I simply think my friend from Massachusetts has fallen into a little error there. There is an old adage among the country people, "Live and let live." I rather fear he is not willing to practice on that rule. When it is in his favor then it is all right to filibuster; when it is against him it is all wrong. In other words, I think he wants to take it on the rule of "heads I win, tails you lose." In any event it is right with the republicans if they can carry it, and it is wrong for the democrats to throw any obstruction in the way by preventing the republicans from carrying out their purpose to unseat democratic officials.

It seems to me if the Senator will reconsider this matter, he will not insist upon his position, nor will he be satisfied with his reasoning. We invite you into executive session, and we will continue every hour to invite you there. There are treaties upon the table that ought to be acted upon; there are nominations being sent in daily by the President that ought to be acted on. This side of the House is ready and will be ready constantly to go on with that business. Your side insisted yesterday morning that that was the only business in order. Now we say go with us into executive session; that is the proper business before us. If you say you will not, then let us adjourn; there is nothing else for us to do here. If you will not adjourn, let us go into executive session. If you will not go into executive session, let us adjourn. [Laughter.] There is nothing else for us to do. I do not think that is treasonable. But as you have challenged us to a question of physical endurance, we will simply have to accept and do the best we can.

The Constitution of the United States says "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." The Senate has made rules to govern its proceedings. Those rules give Senators on either side the right to make certain motions. One of those is a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business; another is a motion to adjourn. These motions can be made as often as we choose, in strict conformity to the rules of the Senate, and those rules are made in strict conformity to the Constitution of the United States. It follows, then, that our action is constitutional and legal. It can therefore be neither revolutionary nor treasonable. This side of the House has not made a motion to-day that was not in strict conformity to the rules of the Senate, made under the provision of the Constitution above referred to. Nor have we made a motion that was not fully warranted by all the facts and circumstances of the case, or a motion which it was not our duty to the democratic party and to the country to make.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire merely to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to one of his propositions. So far as the question between him and the Senator from Massachusetts is concerned, the Senator from Massachusetts has stated that so clearly that I shall not attempt to call any attention to it; but the Senator from Georgia said in his remarks that his object in the mode of procedure which he suggests that his side of the Chamber shall adopt is to prevent this great wrong from being done. Do I misunderstand him in that? Is not that what he said?

Mr. BROWN. I believe that is the language. I meant that it would be a great wrong, as I went on, I think, to say that these officers who had no notice should be turned out immediately.

Mr. LOGAN. To that proposition I propose to reply. The 4th of March was the beginning of a term of Congress; the Senate is in executive session.

Mr. BROWN. I did not dispute that.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. Now, then, the Senate being called together, what is their first duty under the Constitution? Here is a Vice-President. Suppose that the Vice-President should be taken sick to-day, how will you proceed with business? Do you not have to elect a President pro tempore of the Senate? If on an occasion of that kind under the Constitution you are required to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate, why is it not true that we are by the obligation of the Constitution required to proceed to the election of the other officers?

Mr. BROWN. Because there has been no death, and there is no vacancy. Therefore the case that the Senator supposes is not applicable.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me read from the Constitution:

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall choose "other officers." What other officers?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Its own officers.

Mr. LOGAN. Its own officers. That is what it means.

Mr. BROWN. When?

Mr. LOGAN. I will tell you when. Whenever the majority of the Senate shall determine, not when the minority shall determine. That is the Constitution.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the Constitution fixes no time. The usage has conclusively fixed the time, that it shall not be done at an executive session.

Mr. LOGAN. The Constitution fixes no time, and because it fixes no time the majority fixes its own time.

Mr. BROWN. If it can.

Mr. LOGAN. If it can; and those that prevent it prevent it in the face of that Constitution which you take a solemn oath to obey and support. The oath that you and I have had administered to us with this Constitution open requires us to elect officers of the Senate of the United States, including a President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. We have them now. The Constitution does not require the Senate to have new ones.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, we have not a President pro tempore. We present a resolution naming a President pro tempore of the Senate, and you say he shall not be elected until the last of next November.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, we have said nothing about a President pro tempore.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, but that is part of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN. Not a word of it. If my good friend from Illinois would post himself a little better on the facts of this case he would get along better.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that the resolution has yet been introduced.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, it has not been.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a part of the machinery of the Senate, and it is a part of this election, although the Senator from Massachusetts may not have introduced the resolution. Whenever the Vice-President vacates the chair, no difference at what time, if he vacates it now on business, it is the duty of the Senate to proceed at once to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate. Is not that the rule and the law?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; there is a provision that he may call any one for the day to the chair.

Mr. LOGAN. For the day; but suppose he absents himself for more than a day on business, on account of sickness, on any account?

Mr. BROWN. He has been very careful, as he holds the casting vote, not to absent himself in any case.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about what he has done, but I put the question whether it is not the duty of the Senate to proceed at once to the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate?

Mr. BROWN. When you bring in your resolution to do so, we will consider it.

Mr. LOGAN. Whenever the time comes we will do so; but when you look at the Constitution the language is not only that the Senate may, if the majority desire, elect officers, but the Senate shall choose other officers.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, not other officers.

Mr. LOGAN. "Their other officers."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Their own officers.

Mr. LOGAN. "Their other officers." That is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose the Senator reads it, and perhaps he will be better informed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Then it is a misprint.

Mr. BROWN. In what section is that?

Mr. LOGAN. Section 3 of article 1:

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. Will my honorable friend permit me to ask him a question? He is reading from the Constitution. Does it not also say that the President shall appoint other officers, referring to consuls, postmasters, and others?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. Then the Senate is required to choose its officers——

Mr. BROWN. Permit me to get through with the question. The Constitution requires that the President shall appoint those officers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and yet you and your party filibustered for two weeks to prevent us from organizing the Senate so that that could be done.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point at all.

Mr. BROWN. The committees were necessary in order to carry on the Government, because we could not act on treaties or upon nominations without unanimous consent until the committees were appointed.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the question at all.

Mr. BROWN. That is exactly the question. You obstructed the legislation and obstructed action and filibustered so as not to permit us to organize and do what the Constitution says we shall do; and you broke the quorum and would not allow an executive session at the end of the last Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Did you not then insist that it was the duty of the Senate to proceed to the election of its committees? Was that your position then?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; we were urging it then, and you would not allow it.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if you believed that the Constitution required us to perform that duty and we failed to do it, it justified you in the failure to do it?

Mr. BROWN. We did not believe that the Constitution compelled us to do it just then, but we were anxious to go on with it. We do not believe the Constitution requires these officers to be elected just now, and you are anxious to do it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Constitution does not require that they shall be elected at any time, but it leaves it in the power of the Senate of the United States, and whenever a majority say the officers shall be changed, it changes those officers in compliance with the Constitution, and whenever a minority says that shall not be done, that minority stands in the face of the Constitution of the United States in preventing that act being performed.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him again, I will say to him that we are anxious to proceed now to much more important business than that, to proceed to consider the nominations made by the President of the United States and the treaties before us. They are certainly more important than these little offices here in the Senate, and we are anxious to proceed with the most important constitutional obligation.

Mr. LOGAN. The same principle exactly is involved in what the Senator says, that is, the minority is to decide what is more important, although the majority may decide otherwise. You are to decide the importance of these things, and the majority are to have no voice.

Mr. BROWN. Just as you did a few days ago when we were in a majority.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will not get me into any discussion in reference to what any person has done at any time. I will not take up the time of the Senate in wrangling over what may have been done or what may be done now. It is a very different proposition when you set yourself up as a judge of what is of the most importance for the Senate to do, and you make yourself the judge, in violation of the Constitution that confers that power upon the majority, and not upon the minority.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I take it the Constitution does not confer upon the majority the right to determine the question of conscience for the minority as to which nominations ought to be taken up and first acted upon under the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not?

Mr. BROWN. I say it does not. The majority may have the power to go on and do it if they can, but we have as much right to our opinion as to what ought to be taken up as the majority have.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about opinion. The Senator cannot dodge the question. I have said nothing about opinion; I am talking about the power of the Senate under the Constitution, not to suggest an opinion, but as to the right of the exercise under the Constitution of the conscience and wish of the majority. It is not what your opinion may or may not be, but it is the right given to the majority under this instrument that we all swear to support, and we are to judge of our own conscience and of our own acts.

Mr. BROWN. So are we on this side, though you would judge for us.

Mr. LOGAN. We have no objection to your judgment being exercised if you desire, but the Constitution gives the power to the majority to elect our officers. It gives the power to the majority to decide which are the most important nominations. It gives the power to the majority to decide all questions that come up in this body so far as the administration of the body is concerned.

Mr. BROWN. As we have had occasion to see when you were in the minority lately, it gives the power to the minority to prevent the will of the majority.

Mr. LOGAN. It gives the power to the minority to exercise its own judgment, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said, in obtaining time. You do not obtain that from the Constitution. You obtain it from parliamentary tactics and not from the Constitution.

Mr. BROWN. And it gives the minority the right to exercise its own judgment just in the same way.

Mr. LOGAN. It gives the minority the right as a matter of course. When I say the right I mean they have the physical power to do it. But when you say that you get the right from the Constitution to control the Senate by a minority, I say you find no such right. No, sir, there is no such power given to minorities in this country. The whole basis and fabric of this Government is different; all our institutions are based upon the theory that the majority shall control and not the minority, and the Senator who states that he has a constitutional right derived from the power upon which the Government is based and by which the Senate is to be controlled, to obstruct or prevent the election of officers by virtue of that instrument, makes an assertion that he is not justified in making by any construction that can be fairly given to that instrument.

Mr. BROWN. Then you and your party were entirely unjustifiable in what you recently did.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator, as I told him, will not get me and my party into any discussion except the fact that the Constitution gives us the power, it gives us the right, and says the Senate shall choose their officers, and when you say it shall not be done it is a revolutionary act on your part.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator does not say that now?

Mr. LOGAN. He did say it should not be done until the 1st of December. I will leave it to him if he did not say so.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not deny that he said that.

Mr. BROWN. I said, in response to the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that this was a question of physical endurance, that we accepted that issue, and could stay here as long as you did, if it would be until June or December. That is exactly what I said, and that is simply acting on the exact line that you have acted on. It is only a question as to how long the endurance will last. We are not proposing to throw an obstruction in the way until the end of this Congress, as you did until the end of the other Congress and cause nominations that it was your duty to act on under the Constitution to lie over and to fall.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senate has a right to decide about nominations. As I notice the mode of argumentation of the Senator from Georgia, he is a very adroit man, and his argument is always about something that is not before the Senate. His argument on this question this morning was upon civil-service reform; it was about who had been republicans and who had been democrats. What has that to do with the question? This is a question of construction of the Constitution, not a question of what he may have been in favor of at one time or what some one else may have been in favor of at some other time. It has nothing to do with that. Come square to the issue and meet it and discuss it as it ought to be discussed. I say the Constitution gives the power to the majority to elect the officers of the Senate, and while the majority attempt to do that they are carrying out their oath under the Constitution of the United States, and while the minority deny them that right they are exercising a physical power and not a constitutional right.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me there, I will say that the Senate has elected officers and good officers, and we have them now. It is not a constitutional right that you shall on any particular day change those officers. If the Senate had no officers, then I would admit that we were wrong if we did not go into an immediate election. On the other point I have simply to remark that I always make my arguments in strict conformity to the rules of the Senate, and I never take more latitude than the rules permit.

Mr. LOGAN. Now the artful dodger is seen in this Chamber.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I have seen him before.

Mr. LOGAN. But none so artful as the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. Except my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; we have officers, and we have a Senator too from Georgia whose place the Senator took. There are changes that come continually under the Constitution. There are but seven Senators in this Hall to-day——

Mr. BROWN. I will remark that I never took the place of my predecessor until there was a vacancy.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a vacancy at all times in the Senate whenever the Senate shall choose to change its officers. The Senator as a lawyer pretends that because there are officers of the Senate the Senate has no right to change them; but will he as a lawyer say that because the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled have passed a law which law is not in accord with the opinion of a future Congress, they must not change that law because they have a law? Is that his argument?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the argument the Senator made in reference to the officers.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN. His argument is, you must not change the officers because you have officers. Therefore you must not change a law because you have a law; you must not change Senators because you have Senators. There is no argument in that; and I am only astounded that the Senator has, by passing through many years of toil and study, learned more of adroitness than he has of profound reason.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman may judge me by his own standard. I will leave it for others to decide.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume that we all judge one another according to what we see of one another. I am perfectly willing for the Senator to judge me, because I would be judged by him as all other men would be judged, for he towers so much above all mankind that they all seem little in his eye.

Mr. BROWN. I will leave to the Senator the same right of judgment.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator's profound wisdom has been shown so often and his contempt for the opinions of others, that of course he, in his profoundness, must be respected on all questions, and I only in my humble capacity, with a right that I have as a Senator, beg leave humbly to differ with the honored Senator from the great State of Georgia on this constitutional question.

Mr. BROWN. I happen to be backed, I believe, in my judgment by the opinions of at least one-half of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not heard all the Senators express themselves. I am only speaking of the remark which the Senator made in reference to the right under the Constitution, and I will only say to him now that when he declares before the country that the majority of the Senate have not the constitutional right conferred upon them, and that they are not acting in obedience to their oaths and in accordance with their duty when they undertake to elect officers of their choice—when he denies that right he denies the right which the Constitution confers upon the majority of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I have not denied any such right; I have admitted that all the while; but I have said that we have officers now, and when the majority of the Senate elect others we shall then have new ones. Until then we shall retain those we have, and they are very good ones.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all very true. I do not suppose that there is a boy in this country, however unfortunate he may have been in his learning or in his opportunities, but who knows at least that much. I know that much myself.

Mr. BROWN. I congratulate you, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know but that there are other Senators on this floor who know even that much.

Mr. BROWN. I again congratulate you.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, yes; I am glad to be congratulated by the great Senator from Georgia, the constitutional expounder from the State of Georgia.

Now, sir, I have said about all that I wish to say except that notwithstanding the great power and authority, wisdom and experience that is within the compass of the expansive intellect of the Senator from Georgia, I cannot understand the Constitution any other way than as I read it, that we have the right to elect officers, we have the power to do it by numbers. The only reason that we shall not or cannot is by Senators who have taken an oath to support the Constitution standing here from day to day until next December, as the Senator says, in violation of that oath and preventing the majority from exercising the right that it has under the Constitution. If that is the proposition, then we understand it. If that is what is intended on that side, then we understand it.

Mr. BROWN. That is not the proposition at all. Nobody denies the right of the majority to do any constitutional act that the minority cannot defeat by the use of the means placed in its power by the Constitution and rules of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the proposition as I understood it from the Senator, exactly as I understood it, that you propose to stay here until the 1st day of December and prevent us under the Constitution from performing that act which the Constitution authorizes us to perform. If that is the proposition, it is revolutionary.

Mr. BROWN. "Null and void."

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it is revolutionary, and how so? It is a revolution against the power of this Senate under the Constitution, and is only a step that might go further and be revolution against the power of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I desire to refresh the memory of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the Constitution. As I understood that Senator, he laid down the ground that the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, or what he stated to be the proposition of this side, is treason. Let me read to that Senator——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I did not say anything about that side. I confined myself to the statement of the Senator from Georgia of a purpose not to permit the Senate to elect its officers if the minority sat here from now until December making dilatory motions. I have not heard the honorable Senator from Virginia announce such a doctrine.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then the Senator from Massachusetts does say that if the Senate should stay here until that time it would be an act of treason. Let me read to the Senator how the Constitution defines treason:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

Treason shall consist only in that, says the Constitution. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to announce from his place in the Senate that the attempt to defeat the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States is adhering to the enemies of the United States and giving them aid and comfort!

Now, Mr. President, a word on the subject of what is and what is not revolutionary here. On this side of the House we know the fact that there are pending numbers of nominations for most important offices in the Government to be filled. The Supreme Court of the United States has had to adjourn day after day for want of a sufficient number of justices to proceed to the business of that tribunal; and while that great tribunal is held in abeyance, while the wheels of justice of the United States are stopped to that extent, while we know that before this body is a nomination to fill a vacancy on that court so that the business may go on, and while the Senators on this side propose to go into executive session for the purpose of filling that and other vacancies, the gentlemen on the other side are saying that we are revolutionary in obstructing merely the turning out of a few officers here and substituting others in their places. I leave it to the public to judge between those two which is the party that seeks to practice revolution, that party which says that until we elect officers of the Senate there shall be no vacancies supplied on the Supreme Court of the United States, there shall be none of these vacancies filled throughout the country where they are needed. All of that is to stop; all of that constitutional right, all of that duty to do the public business is to stop until we turn out a few officers here and put others in their places!

Mr. President, I differ entirely with the Senator from Illinois as to his construction as to your right and who has the majority on this floor. You, sir, have no voice whatever in deciding what business shall be brought before this body. The only thing you can do to influence the legislation of this body is when business has been brought before it and when it has been discussed and when a vote has been reached and when it is announced that that vote is a tie; then you can count, you may make a majority then, but not till then. In all the preliminary proceedings you are no more there, sir, than the chair you sit upon. In originating business, in discussing business, in deciding what shall be brought before the body, in deciding what the body shall do, you have no voice whatever; and yet the Senator from Illinois claims that because you can give a casting vote when we come to a vote and have a tie, you constitute a majority in bringing business before the body. That is the claim of the honorable Senator from Illinois. So far as this Senate stands now, it stands exactly divided between the two parties, thirty-eight Senators upon each side. In making motions on the floor, in bringing in bills, in calling up business, in deciding what the body shall do, the Vice-President is as if he did not belong to the body at all; and for the purpose that we are now considering what we shall do, for the purpose of bringing matters before the body, the vote of the Vice-President and his presence here cannot be counted at all. It can only be counted when the time comes that it is ascertained that there is a tie vote. Then his constitutional right comes in, and not till then. We can count him in no other way and at no other time.

Mr. President, I think that this condition of things is one not contemplated by the Constitution. What was meant and what the framers of the Constitution said, according to my idea, was that when an accidental, occasional tie vote arose in the progress of business, then in order to prevent a stop of business the Vice-President might vote; but as it is now, and as claimed by the gentlemen on the other side, the Vice-President is the Senate; he can do everything; the whole business of the body is to be controlled by him. Our rules say that the committees of the body shall be elected by the Senate; but who has elected them? He has made the committees. Our rules say that the officers shall be elected by the Senate, and now it is proposed that the Vice-President shall elect them. This makes the Vice-President the Senate in fact, and takes away from the Senate all right to do anything except put questions in form and the Vice-President determines them.

Mr. LOGAN. Has the Senator any confidence in the opinions of Henry Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Berrien?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Will he allow me to read them?

Mr. JOHNSTON. We have all read them. We do not differ about the power of the Vice-President.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator said he did not believe the vote of the Vice-President was intended for cases of this kind. This is exactly a case of the kind on which those opinions were expressed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That was an isolated case.

Mr. LOGAN. It arose on the election of officers for the Senate of the United States. Mr. Calhoun said there was no doubt and Mr. Clay said there was no doubt about the right of the Vice-President to vote. Mr. Berrien said so, and so did all the leading men of the Senate in 1850. There is no such question as the Senator now presents in reference to the Vice-President being merely set up as a figure-head; but the understanding was that the Vice-President on the occasion of a tie in the Senate became a part of the Senate for the purpose of untying the Senate, and to that extent he was a Senator, with all the powers of a Senator so far as casting a vote is concerned, and that he was put there not as a figure-head, but to preside over the Senate and whenever a tie occurred to untie the Senate. That is the Constitution and what the Constitution intended by making an officer of this kind, and it was so said by every leading man who has ever been in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following resolution:

> Resolved, That——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read for information.

Mr. FARLEY. I only ask that my resolution be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that, unless he may have some further communication to make, the Senate is ready to adjourn without day.

Mr. DAWES. Pending this question, that cannot be in order. It cannot be received at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Except by unanimous consent it cannot be received. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Chair decides the resolution out of order. The question is on the motion to postpone, made by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. Did the Chair decide that the resolution of the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] was not in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so decided.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent and paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] requested me to pair with him on this question, saying that he was called from the Chamber for a time. I therefore decline to vote.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. SHERMAN, (when Mr. LAMAR's name was called.) The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] and myself are temporarily paired on this vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Blair,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Plumb,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Miller,	Teller.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Butler,	Garland,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Saulsbury,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Before the motion is put I ask unanimous consent to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. I would like to inquire if the Senators on the other side will give us any indication of the time when they will be willing to take the vote.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no authority to make a statement on that point.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator give us an expression of his own opinion?

Mr. PENDLETON. I cannot do that.

Mr. CONKLING. Can he give us an expression of the opinion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK?]

Mr. PENDLETON. I leave the Senator from Kentucky to answer for himself.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Massachusetts raise his voice so that we can hear?

Mr. CONKLING. Let the Senator from Kentucky also raise his voice.

Mr. FARLEY. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the debate is going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. FARLEY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is announced I desire to repeat the statement of my pair with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	McMillan	Rollins,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Miller,	Teller.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—21.

Anthony,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vance,
Butler,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Ferry,	Lamar,	Sherman,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 25, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPOINTMENTS IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer the following resolution, and if there is no objection I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate at this session—

First. A list of all appointments other than those in the Army of the United States made in his Department from December 1, 1879, to March 15, 1881.

Second. Under what provisions of law said appointments have been made, the rate of payment per annum, and the amount paid to each person appointed.

Third. What changes, promotions, details, and transfers have been made within said period, with the reasons for such transfers and details from one bureau or division to another.

Fourth. What revocations of appointments and promotions have been made, if any, with dates thereof, and reasons for the same, with copies of all official and personal correspondence and telegrams relating thereto.

Fifth. What clerks, if any, have received pay when not on duty; what clerks have had leave of absence with or without pay, and for what reason, and for what length of time in each case.

Sixth. What reductions of salary have been made within said period, and why said reductions, if any, were made.

Seventh. What dismissals have been made, if any, and for what causes.

Eighth. What employés, if any, have been paid out of a "lapse fund," and how such fund was obtained.

Ninth. Whether any board or commission has been convened for the purpose of making or considering the subject of appointments in said Department, and if so, of whom said commission was composed and what duties it performed.

Tenth. Whether clerks and employés have been paid lower salaries than were provided by the statutes authorizing their employment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather see that in print before I vote for it.

Mr. INGALLS. The resolution can lie over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for the election of officers of the Senate. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to postpone the consideration of the resolution until the first Monday of December next, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ventured to express some surprise yesterday at the utterances of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in regard to what he chose to denominate the conduct of the party with which I act. That Senator declared yesterday in his place that the proceedings on this side of the Chamber were both revolutionary and treasonable, and if I have not forgotten what he said, he stated that he had seen nothing and that nothing had occurred in this Hall so extreme in that direction as the proceedings of yesterday. We have seen the doctrine of secession advocated on this floor, and twenty years ago we saw the whole of the Senators from the Southern States leave their seats and go home to put the doctrine of secession into execution and to dissolve the Union. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts now rises in his place and declares our proceedings were more revolutionary and treasonable than any which had heretofore occurred. I do trust some Massachusetts college will take note of that discovery of the honorable Senator, and will bestow upon him the degrees of which Dr. Peter Pangloss was so proud, the degree of LL. D. and A. S. S.

But I agree to some extent with the Senator that this is a revolution, and a very revolutionary proceeding indeed, and let me call the attention of Senators to what the revolution is. If there are two things on this earth which the republican party up to this day have hated and denounced it is what they call repudiation, and the democratic party. They have kept the North solid by pointing to the South and to Southern States and saying, "Look what the democratic party of the South is doing; it is repudiating its debt and sowing the seeds of repudiation broadcast. The only way for us to do is to strangle the doctrine of repudiation wherever we can." That is the position they have taken; that is the way in which they have kept the North solid against the South. They have all the time declared that no misfortune could occur to the country so great as the accession of the democratic party to power, and the individual democrat has been denounced as well as the party itself. I say it is a revolution and a great revolution when we see the republican party in their caucus nominate for one of the principal offices of the Senate a democrat and a man whom they themselves denounced as a repudiationist, a man who has acquired his only distinction, and who would to-day have been a petty county court lawyer in the county of Shenandoah, Virginia, but for the prominence given to him by his repudiation efforts in that State. Then I am justified in saying that such a course on the part of the republican caucus and the republican party here is revolutionary, and to that extent the honorable Senator from Massachusetts was perfectly right.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asked yesterday who Mr. Riddleberger is. He asked whether he is the author of what is known as the Riddleberger bill. I want to answer that question and tell the Senate who Mr. Riddleberger was and is, and tell them something about that Riddleberger bill. I want to see whether the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is so distinguished for his preservation of the public faith, who has built up the credit of the United States as he has done, and who is so justly proud of it, whose reputation is so high for doing it—I want to see, when he knows Mr. Riddleberger's record, knows his opinions, knows what he has done and what he proposes to do, whether or not that Senator will vote for him.

In giving the record of Mr. Riddleberger I shall have to advert to the record of my colleague, because the two are so shaped together that they cannot be separated. I give now the record of my colleague up to the time that Mr. Riddleberger became associated with him, and then the joint record of the two from that time down.

The first time that my colleague ever appeared upon the theater as a public man and an active politician in the State of Virginia was in the election of 1869. We had had a constitutional convention in 1867, and the constitution was framed by the republicans, who sought to disfranchise nearly the whole white people of the State of Virginia. If the constitution had been adopted as proposed by them the white people of the State would not have been entitled to vote nor to sit on juries, and would have had but few rights. The whole white people of the State of Virginia with a very few exceptions would have been disfranchised. General Grant stepped forward and authorized a separate vote to be taken upon those clauses of the constitution. On that occasion my colleague performed what we all agree in Virginia were very signal services to the State, because he took a very decided, active, and prominent ground against the disfranchising amendments, and was as instrumental as any man in the State of Virginia in defeating them. For that my colleague is entitled to the thanks not only of that State but of the people of the whole country.

The next time he appeared on the stage was in the election for governor in the year 1873. At that time the prominent candidates before the convention for governor were Colonel Withers, my late colleague, and all here know what his sentiments were and how warm a democrat he was, and Governor Kemper. In the contest it was understood that my colleague threw his great weight and influence in favor of Kemper and secured his nomination. Kemper was an extreme debt-paying man, and had been the friend and advocate of every bill that had ever been brought forward in the Legislature for the payment of the debt in full. So was Withers. They both stood upon the same platform, but my colleague espoused the cause of Kemper and secured his nomination.

That brings us down to the year 1877. At that time my colleague was himself a candidate for governor before the regular democratic convention. There was no other convention held that year of any sort. My colleague was opposed by John W. Daniel and F. W. M. Holliday, the present governor.

After long balloting it was found out that my colleague could not get the nomination, and he transferred his whole forces in a body to Holliday and thus secured his nomination. Up to that time there was not a man in Virginia who had any idea that my colleague was not as good a democrat as I am or any other man in the State of Virginia. Never up to that time had he ever, that I heard of, indicated one word of opposition to any funding bill that had ever been passed. The funding bill of 1867 had been passed, the funding bill of 1871 had been passed, and if my colleague ever gave any public utterance through the press or on the stump in opposition to those measures before that date I never heard of it.

The next event was that the readjusters separated themselves from the regular democratic party as they said on State issues merely, not on national issues. They did not separate on national issues, because, as the Senate has heard, my colleague in his speech made here referred to the fact that certain Senators on this floor had gone into the State of Virginia and undertaken to instruct the people in regard to State issues and to talk about things that belonged to the people of the State of Virginia only and that did not concern the people of the United States at large at all.

Therefore it was claimed by the readjusters that they were democrats and separated from the party only on the question of the public debt and nothing else; that in all other respects they were with the democratic party; that that was a local issue to be settled in the State of Virginia, and that any man from the outside that said anything or did anything or interfered in the matter in any way was to be considered an intruder. That was the ground which they took.

That brings us down to what is called the Mozart Hall convention. That convention met in February, 1879, and was the first regular convention of the readjusters that was ever held in the State of Virginia. That convention met in Mozart Hall, in the city of Richmond, on the 25th of February, 1879, laid down a platform of their own, and announced what they intended to do as a party, for before that time without a separate organization they had been fighting inside the democratic party. They then met and organized, but they then claimed to be democrats. My colleague made on that occasion, as the head of the readjuster party, a careful and elaborate speech, in which he spoke of the conservative party as if he was a member of it. I have here his speech on that occasion, prepared with great care, in which he speaks as if he was still a member of the conservative party, and as if those men there were conservatives; because you must understand that in the State of Virginia the democrats are called conservatives. They are democrats, but their local name is conservatives. Here is what my colleague said in that speech delivered only two years ago, in regard to his connection and the connection of the party that was then assembled with the conservative party. He is speaking now of what the party had done:

> Certain it is that without the express sanction of the people no obligations should be assumed which necessitate an increase of the present rate of taxation. The platform of the conservative party on this point is too clear for argument.

He was speaking then in support of and advocating the platform of the conservative party, which was the democratic party.

Then in the fall of 1879 the election came on. At that election the debt-paying party were defeated on the debt question. That was the issue. As to the complexion of the Legislature I wish to refer to what my colleague also said on that subject.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a moment to call his attention to the fact that his colleague is absent from the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia while he is making his remarks upon the public career of his colleague to the fact that his colleague is necessarily absent from the Senate to-day.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I did not know that fact, but I am not saying anything personally offensive to my colleague. I am speaking of his public acts.

Mr. DAWES. I presumed the Senator from Virginia would want to be reminded of the fact.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am sorry it is so, but I am reading the official record, and my colleague will have an opportunity to reply. I am not making any personal attack upon him at all. I am speaking of his public acts, of which I can speak whether he is present or whether he is absent.

Mr. DAWES. There are times when in discussing the public acts of Senators it is very desirable that they should be present.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will postpone his resolution, I will postpone my speech until my colleague, the Senator from Virginia, is here.

Mr. DAWES. I have no suggestion to make to the Senator from Virginia. The Senator understands the courtesy that is due to members of the Senate so much better than myself, being a much older Senator than I am, that I thought he would take it kindly if I brought to his attention what it seemed to me it must be he had not observed, the fact that his colleague could not be here to listen to his very interesting remarks. I thought they must lose much of their force (which I regretted very much) if the Senator should be aware that his colleague would not enjoy the benefit of them. I have no suggestion to make.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have no observation to make, but inasmuch as you insist on having this resolution considered, if you do not want me to speak just stop your resolution and I shall stop the speech. That is the only way you can get me to do it.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution is in the interest of the public business.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Oh, no, it is exactly the reverse; it is an obstruction to the public business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Virginia yield that I may make a motion to go into executive session in order to transact the public business? ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let the Senator from Virginia finish his speech.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Massachusetts wants to transact the public business, and we will give him an opportunity by going into executive session.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the other side will vote to go into executive session, I will yield.

Mr. ROLLINS. Let the Senator from Virginia make his speech.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (to Mr. DAWES.) If you will vote to go into executive session I will yield. Will you do that?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will yield to me a moment—I do not wish to take him off the floor; I could not deprive myself of the enjoyment that his speech is sure to bring—but if the Senator desires to yield, I assure him that I shall press the public business to the extent of my ability.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The public business is executive business at this session. If you will press that, I will yield.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator and myself differ as to what the public business is. I prefer to take the sense of a majority of the Senate upon that question. The Senator is not willing to take the sense of the majority upon that subject.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am not making any personal attack upon my colleague. I did not know that he was absent. I am speaking of his public acts, which he will not deny here or elsewhere. I am reading extracts from his own documents and speeches that he will not deny. I am speaking of his opinions and his public acts.

I want to speak now of the detail of the election of 1879, when the Legislature that elected my colleague was chosen, and I am going to quote now what my colleague said on that point. I have his interview written out with care and elaboration and published in the National Republican of this city during the present winter, in the month of January just passed, from which I propose to read an extract. My colleague was asked by whom he was elected, if he was elected in a way in which he could take what course he pleased here. I desire to give his own statement as to by whom he was elected and the complexion of the body which elected him. In this interview he is himself telling the complexion of the Legislature that elected him, and here is what he says about it:

> In the senate were chosen twenty-three readjusters to seventeen funders, and in the house were elected fifty-seven readjusters to forty-three funders. A majority of the legislators-elect, of both the republican and the conservative parties, were strongly opposed to the McCulloch bill. These, co-operating as readjusters, elected all the capitol officers and county judges, I myself being chosen a United States Senator over Colonel Withers by a joint conservative white majority, exclusive of all colored and republican votes, of seven, of which three were in the house and four in the senate—my total joint readjuster vote being eighty, to sixty cast for Colonel Withers and all others.

He claims in that interview that of the white conservative or white democratic votes he got a majority of seven over all others, three being in the house and four in the senate. There is a declaration of the complexion of the body that elected him, who it was that elected him. He does not pretend that the readjusters were republicans. He himself denominates them democrats, or, as they are denominated in Virginia, conservatives, which is the name, as I have said, of the democratic party in that State.

These were the events of the year 1879; and I come now to the year 1880. Let us see what occurred in 1880, which was the year of the presidential election. The two great parties, the republican and the democratic, were arrayed against each other in every State and every Territory of the country. That was the election which was to decide which party should prevail for four years or perhaps for twenty years. Let us see what course my colleague and Mr. Riddleberger took in that election.

The democrats of Virginia, the regular democrats as they are called, held a convention in May, 1880, and put out an electoral ticket. In the call for the convention their committee invited all the democrats of the State of Virginia to come forward and unite on a democratic ticket. My colleague and Mr. Riddleberger and their party refused to come into that convention. The Chicago convention was held, and nominated General Garfield. The Cincinnati convention was held, and nominated General Hancock. These conventions were held in June. The readjusters of the State held their convention on the 7th of July, 1880, after both the tickets were in the field, after Garfield and Hancock both were nominated, after the platforms of both parties were enunciated and when the whole world knew exactly what each proposed to do and exactly what each was. In that condition of things the readjuster convention held its session, and I want to read to the Senate what it did. I read from the National Republican, which is a sort of organ of my colleague now, I believe, and I take it from the report of the proceedings of that convention. It is from the Republican of July 8:

RICHMOND, VA., July 7.

The readjusters' State convention met in the theater to-day at 11.30 a. m., and was called to order by General William Mahone, chairman of the State executive committee, who made a brief speech counseling harmony and wisdom in the deliberations. He then nominated Colonel H. H. Riddleberger, of Shenandoah, as temporary chairman.

The same man now whom the republicans propose to make Sergeant-at-Arms.

Upon assuming the chair he was greeted with the wildest enthusiasm, the applause continuing for some moments.

The convention went on and took its proceedings, which I shall not read except one resolution. Here is one resolution that the convention adopted to which I want to call the attention of my republican friends:

And believing that the objects hitherto declared and the interest of all people of Virginia are to be best subserved by the election of Hancock and English to the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, therefore it is further declared that the electoral ticket nominated by this convention are instructed in behalf of those candidates and that they are cordially commended to the earnest support of every member of the readjusters' organization in Virginia.

That was the resolution of the readjusters' convention called to order by my colleague, Mr. Riddleberger being temporary chairman. They then proceeded to make an electoral ticket, and let me call the attention of my republican friends to who were on that electoral ticket pledged to Hancock and English. The following electoral ticket was then chosen:

Electors at large, Colonel William E. Cameron, of Petersburgh, and Colonel H. H. Riddleberger, of Shenandoah.

Then we have on the 7th of last July my colleague presiding over a democratic convention, calling it to order, Mr. Riddleberger, temporary chairman, a resolution adopted indorsing Hancock and English, and declaring that the best interests of the country would be subserved by their election, (which I religiously believe myself,) and then making an electoral ticket and putting H. H. Riddleberger at the head of it for the election of Hancock and English.

The election came on, and this ticket was in the field. The readjuster organization in Virginia was pledged to Hancock and English, and the electors were pledged to vote for them if they got a majority of the people of the State of Virginia. I take it for granted that if Mr. Riddleberger voted at all he voted for himself. I do not know whether he voted; I do not know that my colleague voted; but I presume that if they voted at all they did vote for that ticket, and they voted for Hancock and English, as we all understand it.

The Richmond Whig is the organ of my colleague and of the readjuster party in the State of Virginia. It speaks their sentiments, and denounces everybody who is not a readjuster. It is the well-known and admitted organ of that party in the State of Virginia. I do not see that paper often, but on the 25th of last December I happened to take up a number of it, as I was in Richmond that day, and I looked at an editorial that was in it. The editorial was a fierce attack on General John Echols, a member of the house of delegates of Virginia from Augusta County, for daring and presuming to want to vote for General Williams C. Wickham, a distinguished and high republican of the State of Virginia, for Senator against a democrat, William Mahone.

Mr. LOGAN. Did not the Senator himself agree with the article in the Whig at that time?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I did not at the time of the election, but I do now.

I think that that history establishes the fact that the republicans in their caucus have nominated a democrat for one of their principal offices, a man who has been a democrat until to-day, and if he is not a democrat now it is because they have nominated him for Sergeant-at-Arms. I do not know what he is to-day. I reckon he is a republican, and has changed probably since he came here and thought that he could perhaps get this office.

Having given that much of the democratic history of Mr. Riddleberger, I want to revert to another branch of his history. I desire to do it because the gentlemen on that side have boasted so much on their strict adherence to public faith and public credit, because they are never done with twitting the democrats with their want of it; because they set themselves up to be the peculiar guardians of the public faith and public credit of the United States; because they declare continually that if the democrats get possession of the Government the public credit will be ruined and the bonds of the country could not be sold. Let us see what Mr. Riddleberger's record on that point is.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. What effect does the Senator from Virginia think the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate would have upon the credit of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If you elect a man who is a repudiationist you indorse his public act and career. When a man is elected his previous conduct and his career are indorsed. That is the effect it will have on the country. It is saying that a man is under no obligation to preserve the public credit, that he can do as he pleases, and that you republicans on that side, let him be what he may, will indorse him. That is exactly the effect that it will have upon the credit of the country.

Now, Mr. President, in order that this question may be understood in regard to the public debt of Virginia, I propose to have the Riddleberger bill read out and out, the whole of it. It is a long bill; but before I have it read I want to call particular attention to some portions of it, and the first portion of it to which I wish to call particular attention is this: I will venture to say such a thing as this was never put in any bill before:

Whereas the net revenue of the State cannot be safely relied on for more than $2,165,000 after the reassessment required to be made in 1880, owing to the reduction in taxable values estimated to be consequent thereupon, and certain necessary reforms in the system of assessment of property and licenses.

I hold that that portion of the preamble of that bill was an instruction to those who were to assess the lands to assess them below their value. The same Legislature that had this bill under consideration was at the time engaged in the election of judges of the county courts of Virginia and it elected about eighty, all readjusters but one, and he was only saved because he had a son in the Legislature who was a readjuster. These county judges were to appoint the assessors of the lands, and did appoint readjusters. They took care to put in the bill an instruction as to how the duty was to be performed. In order to carry out their views in regard to the public debt and its readjustment it was a necessary thing that the lands should be reduced in value, whether an actual decrease of value at the time or not. Now I want to read for the edification of some of my republican friends what the most prominent republican editor in Virginia says in regard to that thing. The man from whom I now read is prominent enough to be urged by his friends for a Cabinet position; this paper is able, independent, and bold. I ask the Secretary to read from that paper, the Valley Virginian, what he said in regard to that very identical feature of the Riddleberger bill and the proceedings of the readjusters under it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Take in the entire State and judge by the general improvement—not here and there a thriftless county, where the blight of chattel slavery still leaves its perceptible foot-prints—and there is not a fair-minded man in the Commonwealth who will not conclude that values have increased at least 20 per cent., and that if the same measure of valuation had been observed in 1881 which was accepted in 1875, and the same rate of taxation applied, the result would show a revenue of $3,000,000 instead of $2,500,000. Instead of this, by preconceived and preconcerted arrangements the assessments have been so reduced as to sustain the estimate that a reduction of revenue to $2,100,000 will be the result. This is, in plain business language, concealing assets to defraud creditors. It is dishonest, and is as certain to work the destruction of the instigators of it as night follows day. The moral sense of the people will revolt against any such disreputable devices, and they will vindicate their own integrity and the fair name of the Commonwealth by a crushing verdict in November next.

We place the prediction here on record that the people of Virginia will indignantly repudiate the plea of bankruptcy and proclaim to the world that they intend to deal fairly with their creditors in settling the public debt upon just and honorable terms, let the assessments of taxable resources be what they may, under the new process of reaching values adopted in 1881. They cannot afford to stand before the country in the attitude of beggars when the evidences are visible to every eye that values have augmented. They will not consent that party necessities shall be the rule of their moral action, nor that the ambition for place and power shall be held higher than the honor of the State. The contest upon which we are entering is going to test the metal of every man in the Commonwealth; his moral courage will be brought to the crucible and those who dare to do what is right; who, rising to the demands of conscience and public integrity, declare their readiness to disdain the mushroom popularity of an hour, and if necessary sacrifice some little of comfort and convenience, will meet a response that is not dreamed of by those who are chattering about public mendicancy as a false excuse for an open, palpable, flagrant repudiation of $13,000,000 of just and honest debt.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Now, Mr. President, I desire to have read also what the New York Times, the leading republican paper in the United States, says about the Riddleberger bill, and I ask the Clerk to read that.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE VIRGINIA DEBT QUESTION.

For some time past there has been a reasonable hope that the mongrel party of repudiation in Virginia would not succeed in further disgracing the State. It is now no longer a matter of dispute that the precious plan which proposes "to restore the public credit" by repudiating the debts of the Commonwealth originated in the fertile brains of gentlemen who had long enjoyed the distinction of being prominent in the "white man's party," and who were recognized as belonging to that peculiar class of society known in the South as "the native and best." But alone and unaided, frowned upon as they were by the more honorable and conservative of their own party, they soon discovered that they could make no headway unless they could win to their support at least a portion of the negro voters and of the colored members of the Legislature.

Unfortunately their success in this direction was only too great. The colored legislators, the best of whom had but scant views in regard to finance, were readily caught by the plausible stories of the readjusters. They were told that a repudiation of the debt would result in untold benefit to them, that their taxes would be lowered, the public schools for their children greatly improved, and the obnoxious poll tax, which they have always regarded as one of their chief burdens, removed. Deceived by these representations, and by the statement frequently made that their co-operation with the white readjusters would certainly result in the overthrow of the Virginia democracy, the colored men gave cordial support to the demagogues who sought to gain popular favor by swindling the unfortunate men and women who held the State securities. By the efforts of the black men who were thus deluded, the readjusters gained control of the Legislature, and for a time seemed powerful enough to carry out any programme of repudiation, no matter how outrageous, which might be proposed.

Recently, however, there was one indication that the more sensible colored men, quick to understand that they had been deceived, had resolved, as far as possible, to retrace their steps, and on Saturday last, in spite of the most determined efforts on the part of the readjusters, every white republican in the Assembly and all the colored members except three voted to postpone the consideration of the infamous measure known as "the debt bill," and succeeded in carrying it over. From this action it was argued, with some plausibility, that the agents of Secretary Sherman had been using their peculiar influences with the colored men, and that they had so far succeeded that the complete overthrow of the readjusters' combination was only a matter of time. There were many reasons for the belief that the Secretary was instrumental in bringing about the change described, chief among them being the fact that he, boasting as he does of having been instrumental in securing resumption, and anxious as he is to obtain in his presidential canvass the support of the Virginia delegates, cannot afford even the appearance of being on friendly terms with men who deliberately propose to repudiate the just debts of a State. For this reason, if for no other, it was held that he had exerted himself to take the colored men out of the repudiators' alliance.

If the Secretary really did make the attempt, he has failed. The time between Saturday and Monday was used to the best advantage by the leading readjusters, and on the latter day, much to the surprise of those who, from their success on Saturday, had predicted the complete triumph of the debt-payers, the repudiation bill was passed by the aid of the colored members. By the provisions of the measure in question, the principal of the debt is reduced to $20,000,000, and the interest to 3 per cent. Further than this, it is provided that the bonds shall be taxed, that the interest coupons shall not be receivable for State taxes, and worst of all, that the sinking fund established under the constitution for the ultimate payment and extinguishment of the debt shall be abolished. In other words, the bill repudiates nearly one-half of the just and legally-contracted debt of Virginia, and makes no provision for the payment of that portion of it which remains. The only hope of the bondholders is that the governor will veto the bill. That he will be brave enough to do so, thereby incurring the lasting hostility of the readjusters, there is, it is feared, some reason to doubt. Meanwhile, General MAHONE, who was recently elected to the United States Senate by the votes of the repudiators, seems to be more completely in command of the political situation in Virginia than before. At the same time he is being abused by the democrats with increased bitterness, and in retaliation it is not improbable that he may learn to mend his ways, and when he takes his seat in Washington act with the republicans, thereby, under certain contingencies, giving them control of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the date of that paper?

The CHIEF CLERK. March 4, 1880.

Mr. JOHNSTON. About the time of the passage of the Riddleberger bill.

Now, Mr. President, I want to have a few more extracts read, and these extracts are from the Providence Journal, the paper of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] as I am informed, so much respected on both sides of this Chamber, and the chairman of the republican caucus. I send to the Chair extracts from his paper to be read. Let us see what he says.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Providence Journal, Tuesday Morning, January 11, 1881.]

SENATOR MAHONE'S MANIFESTO.

Senator MAHONE, of Virginia, has published a manifesto in behalf of his party. In regard to the debt, he furnishes a great many and some rather bewildering figures; but the sum and substance of his purpose is that Virginia shall repudiate twelve millions of its legally contracted debts, because it finds it inconvenient to pay them. He claims, and by the admission of his own organs, with justice, that the funding party does not propose to pay the whole of this debt, but to readjust it; that is to say, arbitrarily reduce the interest and compel the exchange of bonds, which differs from the bolder repudiation only in name and degree. In regard to other State affairs, Senator MAHONE declares that the platform of his party will be "free suffrage for all men; a fair count at the polls; free education of all children, and an impartial administration of the Constitution and laws for all citizens." In regard to its relations to the Union, its policy is announced to be in favor of accepting the results of the war, the observance of the constitutional amendments and reconstruction acts, the cultivation of fraternal relations with the rest of the Union, and the removal of sectional jealousies and race distinctions from politics. With the exception of its position in relation to the debt, there is no question that the platform of Senator MAHONE is a good one, and that they represent the progressive, intelligent, and unprejudiced element in Virginia, as opposed to the Bourbon reactionists. We even believe, as we said at the time of the formation of the party, that the question of the debt was rather the opportunity for a revolt against the hide-bound despotism of the aristocratic and intolerant party that ruled the politics of Virginia with an iron hand, than the sole desire for repudiation; and it is evident that those who claim the title of the honest party are by no means sound in financial faith. And it might be wished that so liberal a programme regarding political equality and fraternal feeling might triumph over its opposite as held by the Bourbon party. But it is nevertheless true that the stain of repudiation is a fatal one. The party cannot and ought not to live that makes it the basis of its existence.

It will be as fatal as the idea of proscription to foreigners which was made the basis of a similar revolt in the political period preceding the war, and which, after a temporary success like this of Senator MAHONE, fell by the inherent weakness of the knownothing idea. Its purpose was good, and its origin was not jealousy of foreigners—for there were very few in Virginia—but a desire to break up the Bourbon despotism; and if it had been permanently successful it would have been a vital wound to the aristocratic element and perhaps even have preserved Virginia to the Union. But the weakness of its name and platform was fatal. A platform of naked repudiation cannot be less so; and however much regret there may be that more liberal ideas should not rule in Virginia through the effective organization of Senator MAHONE's party it has cut itself off from sympathy as well as from success; and the republican party in nation or State cannot consistently or honorably ally itself with it or help to support it. The way may be long for the republican party in Southern States out of political bondage; but it will not be permanently shortened by wandering in the swamp of repudiation, and the national party cannot afford to stain its name with any affiliation with a faction that ranges itself under that banner. In this case, as in all others, the path of policy will be found to be the path of duty.

[From the Providence Journal, January 28, 1881.]

Circumstances make it especially a misfortune that the senatorial contest in Tennessee did not result in the election of Maynard, aside from the loss of so able, experienced, and honest a legislator in the councils of the nation. It leaves the political authority in the Senate dependent upon the action of Senator MAHONE, of Virginia, the character of whose political success and the foundation of whose party policy in his State will invite a suspicion of bargaining. It places him in the position to demand unworthy consideration in influence and patronage and offers the temptation to either party to yield to it. The influence of hybrid and self-seeking politicians is always injurious, and particularly so when circumstances give them a deciding weight; and, if suspicions do not wrong Senator MAHONE, he is likely to endeavor to improve his opportunity. The one "independent" in the Senate has chiefly achieved for himself a position of ridicule for time-serving and indecision in an endeavor to obtain popularity, and the second is likely to be charged with motives of a darker sort if his conduct is not rigidly partisan from principle or the lack of temptation to be otherwise. In such cases decisive partisanship is a virtue and independence is a disguise for a demagogic indecision or political corruption.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to make a suggestion here?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I noticed that in introducing those articles from the Providence Journal the Senator from Virginia called attention to the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island, now absent, is connected with that paper. That is quite correct; but in asking the Clerk to read the article the Senator from Virginia added, "let us see what he says." Now I am somewhat familiar with journalism, and I am quite aware that Governor ANTHONY, as well as myself, is very often charged with an article published in the journal in which he happens to have a proprietary interest when in fact he may not have written a line for it within six months or a year. It is hardly right to let the inference go that this is exactly what Governor ANTHONY says. It is the expression of a paper with which he is in general in sympathy and in which he has an interest.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know whether he wrote those articles or not, but I take it for granted that every editor is responsible for what appears on important topics in the editorial columns of the paper; and do you mean to say those are not the sentiments of Mr. ANTHONY?

Mr. HAWLEY. I called attention to the exact phrase, "let us see what he says." The odds are a thousand to one that he did not write either of those articles, while in general the paper is conducted in accordance with his ideas. I only called attention to the inference conveyed by the words "let us see what he says."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know particularly about that. I only say these are extracts from his paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to make a statement?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague has nothing whatever to do with the editorial department of that paper, and is not responsible for it in any way. It frequently criticises his action here in the Senate, and it is hardly what may be called a representation of his views. The editor of it is entirely independent of him, and very often criticises Governor ANTHONY's action as frequently as he does my own. My colleague is no more responsible for the editorial course of that paper than I am. He is a stockholder in the paper, and no doubt during the vacation once in a while he writes an article at the request of the editor. He very rarely does even that. I do not think he writes one article a month.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I did not know what Governor ANTHONY's habit was in regard to this paper. But it is a matter of public notoriety that it is his paper, and represents his views.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He owns stock in the paper.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is admitted that he does own part of it, and nobody is prepared to deny that those are his sentiments.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not mean to say that those are not his sentiments.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then there is no use making any remark about my quoting them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not mean to say whether they are his sentiments or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If these are the views of the paper of which he is a stockholder and for which he sometimes writes, they may be presumed to be his sentiments.

Mr. HAWLEY. They may or may not be his sentiments.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Do you not believe they are his sentiments?

Mr. HAWLEY. They are very nearly mine.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well, take it in that way. So much for the opinions——

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator proceeds will he allow me to make a suggestion? I do not wish to interrupt the thread of his argument; but if I understood his argument aright, it is about this: because of the fact that the republicans on this side of the Chamber have suggested the name of Mr. Riddleberger as one of their officers therefore they are responsible for his sentiments; that is to say, they indorse his sentiments. That is the proposition.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I say that.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; now I desire to put this proposition to the Senator for him to answer: Mr. Riddleberger was an officer in the confederate army, is not that true?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I believe he was; I do not know, but I think he was a captain.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Virginia pretend to argue to an intelligent people that because of the fact that this side of the Chamber selects him for one of the offices therefore they indorse his services in the confederate army? Is that his argument? Will he pretend that because General Longstreet is minister to Turkey and sent there by a republican administration after having been in the rebellion against this Government—will he before an intelligent community pretend that by that act we indorse the treason of General Longstreet in former years? Is that his argument? I merely make this suggestion and I ask the Senator to answer it, if that is his view.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The war is over; General Longstreet has repented very humbly of his sins, and you have given out the idea on your side that when a man does that you take him to your bosom. But peace has come, and there is no question of rebellion or secession now before the country; but there are questions of public faith and public credit, and when you undertake to indorse a man on these points now you indorse him in regard to a living, present, and vital issue. That is the difference between the cases.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask this: If we elect a Secretary of the Senate here and he should appoint on the suggestion of republicans a democrat as one of his assistant clerks, would we thereby indorse his democracy?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know whether you would or not. I know when you nominated Mr. Riddleberger you endorsed his sentiments.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When you support him do you not say, "We approve this man and approve of what he has done?"

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I understood the argument of the Senator and others yesterday to be that the officers now in position should be retained on account of their efficiency, that it was not a question of politics at all, but a mere question of efficiency. That was the argument as I understood it yesterday; but now the Senator proposes that we shall not put officers in here on account of their efficiency. That must not be the rule which shall govern us. The rule that governs on his side cannot be applicable to our side at all. I do not say this out of any disrespect whatever to the officers who hold positions here now; but will the Senator contend that because Senators from Northern States who were not in rebellion and did not sympathize with it voted for their election they thereby indorsed the theories of these officers who were elected, who did sympathize with it and who have never said they did not sympathize with it? Will he make that argument?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do say that if the republicans hold a caucus and deliberately select a man of that sort, they indorse him.

Mr. LOGAN. You say the democrats did this?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No; you.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. Having no reference to anything I have done, I ask the Senator this question: At the time the Senate, having a democratic majority, elected the officers who now occupy the positions in the Senate, those officers being, some of them—I will not say all—men who had been in rebellion against the Government, does he pretend to say that the northern democrats who did not sympathize with that rebellion in voting for those officers thereby indorsed what they had done? Is that his argument?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have already said that the war is over, and there is no longer any issue on that point.

Mr. LOGAN. That is no answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator might as well talk about the revolutionary war as the late war, so far as it has any bearing on the question here to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I do not know that a principle on account of age becomes any the less weighty when we come to argumentation. If the principle is good that we shall not indorse a man now because he had on a former occasion done that which we did not then indorse, are we thereby required to indorse that act now because that man performed it? Is that the argument?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator's questions are a little too long, and they take up a little too much of my time.

Mr. LOGAN. They are on the point the Senator has been arguing.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I again state that all these questions as to the war are dead issues.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about the war now.

Mr. JOHNSTON. But the question of the public credit of the country is a live issue to-day; and by your action here you are taking a course in regard to a thing now before the public a living issue.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will put another question if the Senator will allow me, and I beg his pardon——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Do not take too long.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I will not. I will be very short.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Make that the last.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator this question, which is precisely in the line of his argument: Will he pretend to say that certain Senators whose names I could give him, who have very defined notions in reference to our financial system, in other words were for the resumption of specie payments and were what are called hard-money democrats, when they voted for some of the men who are now officers of the Senate who did not agree with them on the subject of finance, thereby the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate for instance indorsed their notions on finance because he voted for them as officers of the Senate? Is that what the Senator contends for? Is that his argument and his logic?

Mr. JOHNSTON. My argument is simply that when the republicans have a caucus and take up a man for an office and indorse that man, they indorse his views and his character and his person and the man. That is the answer to your question.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, then, I will only say if the gentlemen to whom I referred indorsed these men, if they indorsed their financial views, they voted differently when they came into the Senate. That is all.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Virginia designs to continue to yield to the interruptions of the Senator from Illinois without limit, I do not know but what I should like to take a hand in this myself; but I hope the Senator from Virginia will conclude his remarks, and then we may attend to some other things that may arise. I do not want to delay the Senator from Virginia; but if the discussion is to be delayed in this way, I may assist in it.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator from Indiana object to my interrogatories to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VOORHEES. Not in the slightest; but I should like to propound some to the Senator from Illinois myself at the first opportunity I get.

Mr. LOGAN. With the greatest pleasure, I say to the Senator, I will attempt to answer.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will ask one now, whether he would put his name, with all the patronage of Illinois at his command, on the back of the papers of an applicant for the smallest post-office in his State who said that he was not in favor of paying the national debt or the debt of Illinois or any part thereof—not as a thing of yesterday, but now, for I do not understand that Mr. Riddleberger has changed his views as they were laid down, not on a dead issue as to the war, but on a living issue, as was boasted in the presence of this Senate by the leader with whom the other side have made their coalition.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will answer that question hereafter and not take up my time now.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Take your time for it and consider your answer well.

Mr. LOGAN. It will not require any time at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I should like——

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will yield if the question is not too long.

Mr. DAWES. I am interested in the Senator's discussion of the debt of Virginia, and I hope he will do me the favor to state how large the public debt of Virginia is.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am going to do that. If the Senator will listen he will get the information after waiting awhile.

Mr. DAWES. I have an anxiety to know how large this debt is that the Senator desires to pay, so that we can see exactly what it is and how it is to be paid.

Mr. JOHNSTON. You shall know. Mr. President, I desire to say a few more words about the Riddleberger bill. As I said, I intend to have the bill read and spread upon the record. I want everybody to see it, the whole bill, and all its details, and I want to dwell somewhat upon some features of the bill.

The Riddleberger bill declares the public debt of Virginia to be $19,695,196, and undertakes to provide for the payment of that at 3 per cent. interest.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what the bill proposed to do with the public debt of the State of Virginia. It has a long preamble, one of the recitals of which I have already read, which seems to be an instruction to the assessors to be appointed to reduce the valuation of land irrespective of the real facts.

Then the Riddleberger bill in the first place knocks off one-third of the principal of the debt; it knocks off all the war interest of the debt and all the reconstruction interest; it says that during the period of the war no interest shall be paid to any holder of that debt, no matter where he lived, and it is justified on the ground that the North subjugated the State of Virginia and destroyed the property of the State, and it takes the ground that the subjugation absolved the State of Virginia from paying any interest to her own citizens, or to northern citizens, or to English subjects, or to French citizens, or German subjects. In addition to that, it reduces the rate of interest from 6 to 3 per cent. Then, besides that, it reserves the right to tax these bonds, and to tax them out of existence if the State chooses to do so.

So the Riddleberger bill in the first place throws off a third of the debt; in the next place it throws off arbitrarily all the war and reconstruction interest; in the next place it cuts the interest down one-half, and lastly, reserves the right to tax the bonds, and tax them so that the interest may be taken away and the holder get nothing.

Mr. Riddleberger himself and those who supported and favored that bill undertook to make it a law, and their readjuster party proposes to go into the next canvass with the Riddleberger bill as its issue. They have already announced that.

Then, I want to say to the Senate still further in regard to that point that the Riddleberger bill has been substantially pronounced unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the late case of Hartman vs. Greenhow, coming up from the city of Richmond; and notwithstanding the fact that the highest judicial tribunal in the United States has pronounced certain features of the bill a violation of the Constitution of the United States, still they insist that they are going before the people and will try to get the people to indorse that bill and force it upon the country, and not only defy the rights of the creditors but the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States itself; and to-day they are in rebellion against that tribunal because they dispute and defy its authority and say they are going to pass this bill notwithstanding the decision of that court.

These are the main features of the bill. If the Senator from Massachusetts wants to know what the debt is I will tell him that it is one-half larger than the Riddleberger bill wants to make it, and I will read the record. The constitution of the State makes it the duty of each Legislature to publish a debt statement with its acts of Assembly, so that the world may see exactly what it is, and the same Legislature which passed the Riddleberger bill exercised that constitutional duty, and did publish to the world what the debt was. The same Legislature which said they would only pay $19,000,000, put under their oaths as obeying the constitution of the State of Virginia a statement of the true amount of the debt, and here I have it, and will read it for the edification of the Senator from Massachusetts. Here it is in the acts of 1879–'80; and here is the statement made under that constitutional requirement where the principal of the debt is put at $29,667,304.76.

Mr. DAWES. You state that to be the correct amount?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir; on that authority of the statement of the readjuster legislature.

Mr. DAWES. What interest does it bear?

Mr. JOHNSTON. A portion of it bears 3 and a portion 6.

Mr. DAWES. What portion of it bears 6?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I can tell the Senator exactly in a moment. The portion of it that bears 3 per cent. is $7,944,315.80. The balance of it is at 6 per cent.

Mr. DAWES. Are you in favor of paying that sum and that interest?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am in favor of paying everything that we are justly bound to pay; but I am in favor, if the creditor will accept it, of paying a less rate of interest.

Mr. DAWES. But are you willing to pay that sum and the interest?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, I am in favor of paying that sum and the interest. I am in favor of paying every cent which the State owes.

Mr. DAWES. Has the State provided for the payment of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir, it has not. There are some arrearages of interest on a portion of the debt. The debt stands in a very peculiar condition. On a portion of the debt the coupons are receivable for taxes; on another portion they are not.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator state fairly that he is in favor of paying the debt according to that statement and the interest in full prescribed by the law?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, I am.

Mr. DAWES. And of course providing by taxation to meet the interest?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. And I suppose in that respect the Senator represents the action of his own party.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand it so.

Mr. DAWES. I am very glad to have the opportunity of giving the Senator the advantage of that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My sentiments on that subject have never been disguised from anybody. The Senator need not have asked me on this floor what my sentiments were on that point. They have been made public wherever I have had occasion to present them.

Mr. DAWES. It was not from any doubt I had, but it was the gratification I should feel in hearing the Senator state it publicly on this floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It gratifies you to know what you knew before or ought to have known without asking the question.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say that I regret exceedingly that he has not kept his own party up to that high standard while they have been in power in the State of Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is very much troubled.

Mr. DAWES. I regret it exceedingly because on that position I agree with the Senator that every dollar of the debt and of its interest should be paid in full. I only regret that when his party has been in power and has sent so able a representative to the national councils, he has been unable to hold up his party to that point.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The party that I belong to has been held up to that point.

Mr. DAWES. I understand his party to have been in power up to this last Legislature, and still they have not provided for the debt. I may be mistaken, perhaps.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir. There have been various bills for the settlement of the debt, but they were defeated by one means or other by the readjusters, although they did not have a distinct organization.

Now, on the subject of the public debt I also want to state what the report of the present auditor of the State of Virginia for the year ending September 30, 1880, shows. This is the auditor put in by the readjusters; he is their man, elected by them, and he states what the debt proper is, and he is very particular to call it "debt proper." That is the language he uses in this report:

Change in amount of principal of debt proper since last report:

Amount reported October 1, 1879	$29,667,304 76
Amount now reported	29,685,693 00

He gives this as the amount of "debt proper," a little changed, owing to the operation of the sinking fund and the funding of back interest.

Now, we have the declaration of the Legislature of what the debt proper is—we have the statement of the auditor of what it is. With these tables of the amount of the debt—the debt proper—the amount that the State of Virginia owed, the Riddleberger bill knocks off upwards of one-third and declares that the State shall pay no more. Then the Riddleberger bill does not pretend to ask the consent of the creditors, but it makes a bargain all on one side. It says to the man who has a bond and paid value for it "we will make a new contract for you; we do not ask your assent to it"—it does not take two to make a contract according to them but one party can do it—"and we will make a contract to pay you only so much and reserve the right to tax your bonds." The Legislature of a State only has a right to tax property within its confines; but they undertake to tax property of a man who has his bonds locked up in his safe in London and say "we will tax not only property in the State of Virginia but we will tax bonds of the State held wherever they may be, by our own citizens or by anybody else, and tax them as high as we choose."

Now I desire to read a little from what General MAHONE himself said on the subject of the amount of this debt to show what his views were. In his Mozart Hall speech he undertook to state to his friends there assembled at the convention, in an elaborate and carefully prepared manner, what the amount of the debt was, and he was so particular as absolutely to descend to cents and made the debt of the State $32,977,090.02. He said that was the amount the State owed. Some time after that his paper indorsed that same statement in this language:

I would use my best endeavors to secure a vote of the people sanctioning a settlement at 3 per cent. for forty-five years, on the basis of $32,977,090.02.—General Mahone's Mozart Hall speech.

And then the paper says:

And that is still the general's position, as we understand it, in which he is heartily supported by readjusters as a whole.

With those declarations of their leaders that the debt was upwards of thirty million, with their published statement in the acts of the Assembly that it was thirty million, with the report of their auditor that it is thirty million, the Riddleberger bill proposes to pay only nineteen million and some odd thousands of dollars, repudiating absolutely one-third of the debt. It proposes to reserve the right to tax that part which it does not repudiate, and proposes to do all this without asking the consent of the creditor or making him a party to the transaction in any manner, shape, or form; and the Senator from Illinois now proposes to vote for the author of that bill, and the man who championed it in the Legislature of Virginia, who announces that he is going to champion it in the future and get the people of Virginia to indorse it again in despite of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me? Why do you say that the Senator from Illinois proposes so to vote? Do you suppose I am going to vote singly and alone?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, I do not.

Mr. LOGAN. Why did not the Senator say the republicans of the Senate will so vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well, the republicans of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator propose to charge that I indorse any repudiation because I vote for this man?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If you indorse a man of that sort it is a public act, and I hold that every public man indorses a man he votes for for office.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say, then, to the Senator once for all that at no time in my life have I ever indorsed repudiation, nor do I ever expect to; and if the constituency of the Senator from Virginia had been as honest in paying their debts as the constituency that I represent, the question of the payment of their debt would not now be before them.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have something to say on that debt.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read a short extract from a letter written by a prominent gentleman in the State of Virginia, a man who was so prominent that he was temporary chairman of the Mozart Hall convention of which I have already spoken, and contested the nomination for Congress of the readjuster party at the late election in that State in the district in which I live, Mr. Frank Blair. He wrote a letter which is published, and I want to read to the Senate an extract from that letter as shadowing the opinions of those with whom he acts, because during the last canvass Mr. Riddleberger was in that part of the State, he and this man Blair appearing on the same stumps together and advocating the same thing. Here is what Mr. Blair said:

Having achieved a great triumph in the State on our view of the debt issue, I now favor a vigorous application for the readjustment principles to the national debt.

That is Mr. Blair, a prominent readjuster, an aspirant for Congress, contesting the nomination, after the publication of that letter and after his views were known and supported by half the readjuster party in the district where he lived.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say only a word in regard to the party to which I have belonged in the State of Virginia. I do not know why it should be attacked. I desire to know what is called here the Bourbon party in the State of Virginia has done. Permit me to give a brief statement of that.

Mr. HOAR. I can tell the honorable Senator what a Bourbon is if he would like to know. It was a man who never learnt anything or forgot anything; but the Bourbons are advancing down South, and now it is a man who never learns anything and forgets a great deal. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. I cannot be a Bourbon, then, because I learnt something from the Senator yesterday. I learnt that filibustering was treason.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. JOHNSTON. So I cannot be a Bourbon. I have learnt that much from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LOGAN. But you may forget it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, a Bourbon never forgets anything.

I wish to state now very briefly what that party that is so much denounced has done in the State of Virginia. Everybody knows that the State of Virginia was the theater of the war. I do not know whether my honorable friend from Illinois was in that State during the war; I think he served almost wholly in the West, but he knows, and all here know, that the State of Virginia was the theater of the war, and that it suffered as much as a State could suffer from the marching, the encampment of armies upon its territory. That being the state of things in Virginia, the people being left without property—their farms were fenceless, their very houses gone—it is said that General Sheridan said he made the Valley of Virginia so that when a crow flew over it it would have to carry its rations along with it. I do know how the State was devastated. Notwithstanding that, in the little time that has elapsed since the end of the war, but a brief period in the life of a State, this party has done these things:

The State of Virginia, under the rule of that party, has increased since 1870 three hundred thousand in population, or at the rate of 23 per cent.

That party to which I belong in the State of Virginia was the party that gave to the Hampton Normal and Agricultural School, which is a school for colored people exclusively, without one dissenting voice, one-third of the land scrip that the United States donated to the State for agricultural-college purposes.

That is the party that established the common schools six years in advance of the time they were required by the constitution of the State to do so.

That is the party that are educating now the colored people all over the State.

That is the party that in the city of Richmond has expended $250,000 of its own means to build school-houses in that city, and spends $50,000 annually for the same purpose, independent of the contribution of the State fund.

That is the party that are taxing themselves to educate the children of the colored people, many of whom will not even pay the capitation tax of $1 upon their own heads, which goes to the school fund, and require the whites to contribute the money almost entirely for the education of their children.

That is the party that proposed what is called the Henkle bill and passed it over the opposition of the readjusters, by which the school fund was put in position where it could not be diverted from its purpose, but should be secured in each county to the schools in that county.

That is the party under whose rule railroads have been built over the State, new steam lines established, business revived, the population of some of our cities doubled, the export business of the city of Norfolk increased 800 per cent., its internal trade increased 1,200 per cent. That is the party under whose government mines have been opened and capital invited.

It is the party with which my colleague and Hon. H. H. Riddleberger continued to act up to a very recent period; I do not know when, but a very short time ago.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask the Secretary to read the Riddleberger bill, which I send to the desk to have read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill to re-establish the public credit.

Whereas the people of Virginia have renounced the basis and principles of the proposed settlement of the public debt which are comprehended in the act of Assembly approved March 28, 1879; and

Whereas it is confidently believed that the people of this State will never acquiesce in any settlement which shall obligate them and their posterity to pay any part of the interest upon the public debt which accrued during the war and the period of reconstruction; and

Whereas the principal of the debt recognized by the act approved March 30, 1871, computed to the 1st of July following, and taken as the debt of the State before the creation of West Virginia at $45,718,112.23, embraced $15,025,604 of capitalized interest, which had accrued during the period of war and reconstruction; and

Whereas every consideration of equity and the circumstances of war, the immense loss of property by the people of Virginia, aggregating $500,000,000, and the shrinkage in assessed values from $723,000,000 to $336,000,000, reducing the revenues from over four millions to two and a half millions, further justify the elimination of such capitalized interest from any computation of the debt; and

Whereas the amount of such capitalized interest constitutes, as near as may be, one-third of said indebtedness so computed to July 1, 1871; and

Whereas legislation assigning two-thirds of said indebtedness to Virginia and one-third to West Virginia has been generally acquiesced in, and the principal of the indebtedness thus wrongfully apportioned to Virginia under the computation of the act approved March 30, 1871, is, as of January 1, 1880, $31,102,573, whereof $22,909,447 is evidenced by bonds or other obligations issued under acts of March 30, 1871, and March 28, 1879, and hereinafter denominated as Class A, and the remainder by bonds and other evidence of debt designated as Class II, by the act approved March 28, 1879, aggregating as of January 1, 1880, the sum of $8,193,124; and

Whereas the holders of said obligations of Class A (except as to $2,500,000 of Class II, funded under the said act of March 28, 1879) have for nine years, including July 1, 1880, received interest nominally at 6 per cent. upon a principal one-third too large by the wrongful capitalization of interest as aforesaid, which reckoned at 4½ per cent. amounts to over three million dollars, and ought not in equity to have been paid; therefore the principal of said indebtedness as it now stands, amounting to $22,909,447, ought to be reduced by the amount of interest so wrongfully capitalized, and the interest upon interest thus wrongfully paid to the holders of such bonds; and therefore the principal of this class of the State indebtedness should in equity be reduced to $12,142,000, or at the rate of $53 for every $100 of the face of such indebtedness as is now outstanding; and

Whereas the principal of that part of the debt known as Class II, in the act of March 18, 1879, amounting as of January 1, 1880, to $8,193,124, is one-third too large by the wrongful capitalization as aforesaid, the same should be reduced to $5,462,083, or at the rate of $66.66⅔ for every $100 of the face of such indebtedness as is now outstanding; and

Whereas interest for nine years to 1st July, 1880, has been allowed upon the principal of the debt embraced in Class II, aforesaid, which principal is too large by one-third of the amount thereof because of the capitalization of interest aforesaid, and there is now past due and unpaid of such interest $3,435,145, therefore it is equitable that the same should be reduced by the sum of $1,474,762 (that being interest upon the one-third of principal so wrongfully capitalized) or funded in the bonds authorized to be issued under this act at the rate of $60 for every $100 of such past due and unpaid interest aforesaid; and

Whereas the equitable adjustment of the public debt of the State as determined by the application of the facts and principles aforesaid fixes the aggregate thereof at $19,665,196; and

Whereas there are now outstanding $783,241.50 of past-due tax-receivable coupons and balances due to the schools, asylums, and on other accounts, amounting to some eighteen hundred thousand dollars, for the payment of which it is of paramount importance that provision be made in the apportionment of the current net revenues of the State; and

Whereas the net revenue of the State cannot be safely relied on for more than $2,165,000 after the reassessment required to be made in 1880, owing to the reduction in taxable values estimated to be consequent thereupon and certain necessary reforms in the system of assessment of property and licenses; and

Whereas the existing rate of taxation is recognized to be the highest that can be endured under the circumstances of the long distress and heavy burdens of this people, and the search for new subjects of taxation has been exhausted; and

Whereas the necessary expenses of conducting the government, after adopting and applying every practicable measure of reform and economy, cannot safely be estimated below the sum of $900,000, and the proportion of such estimated revenue due to the public schools will be $431,700, the balance remaining for the liquidation of the public debts aforesaid and for the payment of interest upon the bonds created by this act cannot exceed $833,300; and

Whereas the means of prompt and regular payment should be apparent and the people's approbation of this settlement should be expressed at the polls, in order to give assurance of the good faith and performance thereof: Therefore,

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, That the board of commissioners of the sinking fund of the State be, and they are hereby, empowered and directed to create bonds, registered and coupon, to such an extent as may be necessary to comply with the provisions of this act.

2. Said bonds shall be dated July 1, 1880, and be payable at the office of the treasurer of the State on the 1st day of July, 1920: Provided, That the State may at any time and from time to time after July 1, 1890, redeem any part of the same, principal and interest, at par. In case of such redemption before maturity, the bonds to be paid shall be determined by lot by said board of commissioners, and notice of the bonds so selected to be paid shall be given in a newspaper published at Richmond, New York, and London, England, when interest from and after ninety days from the date of such publication in London shall cease upon the bonds so designated to be paid.

3. The form of the bond shall be as follows, to wit:

"The Commonwealth of Virginia acknowledges herself indebted to —— (in the case of a coupon bond to bearer, and in the case of a registered bond inserting the name of the person or corporation) in the sum of $——, which she promises to pay in lawful money of the United States at the office of the treasurer of the State, Richmond, Virginia, on the 1st of January, 1920, with the option of payment at par, principal and interest, before the maturity at any time after July 1, 1890, and interest, at the office of the treasurer of the State, in such lawful money, on the 1st days of January and July, at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum until paid, (according to the tenor of the annexed coupons—in the case of coupon bonds.) In testimony whereof witness the signature of the treasurer and the counter-signature of the second auditor hereunto affixed according to law."

4. The form of coupon for coupon bonds shall be as follows, to wit:

"No. —— (of bond.)

"The Commonwealth of Virginia will pay to bearer —— dollars, in lawful money of the United States, at the office of the treasurer, Richmond, Virginia, on the 1st day of, (January and July, alternately, the first coupon to be payable January 1, 1880.)

"$——. "—— —— Treasurer."

Each coupon to be impressed on the back with its number, in the order of maturity, from one forward.

5. The said board of commissioners are authorized to issue such bonds in denominations of one hundred, five hundred and one thousand dollars, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, each denomination to be of different tint: provided that registered bonds may be issued of any denomination multiple of one hundred, and all registered bonds to be of the same tint; and they are authorized to issue such bonds, registered or coupon, in exchange for the outstanding obligations of the State hereinbefore enumerated, including the bonds held by the literary fund, as follows; that is to say:

(a) For the principal of all bonds or other evidence of debt embraced in Class A, at the rate of 53 per cent.; that is to say: $53 of the bonds authorized under this act (principal and accrued interest from the preceding period of maturity to the date of exchange at par) are to be given for every $100 face (principal and accrued interest from the preceding semi-annual period of maturity to the date of exchange) of such indebtedness, and for any interest which may be past due and unpaid upon such indebtedness funded bonds issued under this act may be given dollar for dollar.

(b) For the principal of all bonds or other evidences of debt embraced in class 2 at the rate of 66⅔ per cent.; that is to say $66.66⅔ of the bonds authorized by this act (principal and accrued interest from the preceding period of maturity to the date of exchange at par) are to be given for every $100 face of the principal of such indebtedness.

(c) For two-thirds of the interest past due and unpaid upon the unfunded debt, including the sterling bonds since July 1, 1871, and for all other past-due and unpaid interest upon other bonds and evidences of debt embraced in class 2 to the date of exchange, at the rate of 60.1 per cent.; that is to say for every $100 of such interest so computed $60 of the bonds issued under this act (principal and accrued interest from the preceding period of maturity to the date of exchange at par) are to be given.

6. For the one-third of the unfunded debt, including the sterling bonds computed as of the 1st of July, 1871, the said board of sinking-fund commissioners shall issue a certificate, as follows:

"No. ——.

"The Commonwealth of Virginia has this day discharged her accepted share of the (registered or coupon, as the case may be) bonds for —— dollars, held by ——, dated the —— day of ——, and numbered ——, leaving a balance of —— dollars, with interest from the 1st day of July, 1871, to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia without recourse upon this Commonwealth.

"Done at the capital of the State of Virginia this —— day of ——, 18——.

"—— ——, Treasurer.

"—— ——, Second Auditor."

7. The said board of commissioners are empowered to issue for any fractional part of $100 of the indebtedness funded under this act the following certificate:

"Fractional certificate.

"Register No. —. Transaction No. —.

"This certificate entitles the holder hereof to the sum of $——, fundable at its face in the bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, authorized by an act approved the —— day of ——, 1880, when presented with certificates of like tenor or in conjunction with other evidences of debt fundable under said act in amounts of $100 and multiples thereof.

"Done at the capital of Virginia this —— day of ——, 188–.

"—— ——, Treasurer.

"—— ——, Second Auditor."

The certificates so issued shall be registered by the second auditor in a register kept for that specific purpose, giving the date and number of the transaction to which it relates, the amount of the same, and the name of the person or corporation to whom it was issued; and as such certificates are refunded the same shall be canceled and preserved as herein provided in respect to other obligations refunded.

8. All the bonds and certificates of debt and evidences of past-due and unpaid interest taken in under the provisions of this act shall be canceled by the treasurer, in the presence of the board of commissioners of the sinking fund, as the same are acquired by the treasurer, and the same shall be carefully preserved until such time as the General Assembly may otherwise direct; a schedule of the bonds, certificates, and other evidences of debt so canceled from time to time shall be certified by said board and filed with the treasurer for preservation.

9. All the coupons and registered bonds and fractional certificates issued under this act shall be separately registered by the second auditor in books kept for the specific purpose, in each case giving the date, number, and amount of the obligations issued, and the name of the person or corporation to whom issued, and the date, number, and amount and description of the bond, bonds, or indebtedness surrendered.

10. The plates from which the bonds and fractional certificates authorized by this act are printed shall be the property of the Commonwealth, and shall remain in the keeping of the said board of commissioners of the sinking fund.

11. In the year 1890, and annually thereafter until all the bonds issued under and by authority of this act are paid, there shall be separately levied and collected as other taxes are collected a tax of two cents on the $100 of the assessed value of all property in the State subject to taxation for other purposes, which shall be paid into the treasury to the credit of the sinking fund; and the commissioners of the said sinking fund shall annually, or oftener, apply the same to the redemption or purchase (at a rate not above par) of the bonds issued under this act, and the bonds so redeemed shall be canceled by the said board, and the same registered by the second auditor in a book to be kept for the purpose, giving the number, the date of issue, the character, the amount, and the owner at the time of purchase of the bonds so redeemed and canceled.

12. Executors, administrators, and others acting as fiduciaries, may invest in the bonds issued under this act when so authorized by the county, corporation, or circuit court, to which such executor, administrator, or other fiduciary is accountable for the trust subject, and the same, when so made, shall be considered a lawful investment.

13. That the semi-annual interest as it may become due and payable upon the bonds issued under this act may be promptly and regularly met one-third of the net revenue collected from the levy on all property, (personal, real, and income,) and one-half of the net revenue collected from licenses, shall be separately collected and paid into the treasury to the credit of the public debt, and the same applied to the payment of the interest thereon: Provided, That the Legislature may at the end of every succeeding two years from the 1st of January, 1892, pass to the credit of the sinking fund such balance as may then stand to the credit of that account over and above any interest which may then remain due and unpaid upon the bonds issued under this act, such balance so transferred to be employed by the said commissioners of the sinking fund in the redemption of the said bonds, as provided in the eleventh section of this act.

14. The several tax collectors of this Commonwealth shall receive in discharge of the taxes, license taxes, and other dues, gold, silver, United States Treasury notes, national-bank currency, and the temporary-loan certificates as hereinafter provided, and nothing else: Provided, That in all cases in which an officer charged by law with the collection of revenue due the State shall take any step for the collection of the same, claimed to be due from any citizen or tax-payer, such person against whom such step is taken, if he concedes the same to be unjust or illegal, or against any statute, or to be unconstitutional, may pay the same under protest, and upon such payment the officer collecting the same shall pay such revenue into the State treasury, giving notice at the time of such payment to the treasurer that the same was paid under protest. The person so paying such revenue may, at any time within thirty days after making such payment, and not longer thereafter, sue the said officer so collecting such revenue in the county or corporation court in which said revenue was assessed and paid. If it be determined that the same was wrongfully collected, for any reason going to the merits of the same, then the court trying the case may certify of record that the same was wrongfully paid and ought to be refunded; and thereupon the auditor of public accounts shall issue his proper warrant for the same, which shall be paid in preference to other claims on the treasury. There shall be no other remedy in any case of the collection of revenue or the attempt to collect revenue illegally, or the attempt to collect revenue in funds only receivable by said officers under this law, the same being other and different funds than the tax-payer may tender or claim the right to pay than such as are herein provided, and no writ for the prevention of any revenue claim, or to hinder or delay the collection of the same, shall in any wise issue—either injunction, supersedeas, mandamus, prohibition, or any other writ or process whatever; but in all cases where for any reason any person shall claim that the revenue so collected of him was wrongfully or illegally collected the remedy for such person shall be as above provided, and in no other manner.

In all such cases if the courts shall certify of record that the officer defendant acted in good faith and diligently defended the action, the necessary cost incurred by him shall be taxed to and paid by the State as in criminal cases. The Commonwealth's attorney of the county or corporation in which suit is brought shall appear and represent the defense. In every case where judgment is rendered for the defendant a fee of $10 shall be taxed in favor of said attorney and against the plaintiff; and whenever the court shall refuse to certify the good faith and diligence of the officer defending the case, a like fee of $10 shall be taxed against the said officer. Any officer charged with the collection of revenue who shall receive payment thereof in anything other than that hereinbefore provided shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, in the discretion of the court, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to subject any officer of the State to any suit other than as hereinbefore provided for any refusal on his part to accept in payment of revenue due the State any kind or description of funds, security, or paper not authorized by this act.

15. The auditor of the State shall prepare and furnish to the clerks of the county and corporation courts of this Commonwealth, on or before the 15th day of July, 1881, a book known as "Temporary-Loan Book," which shall consist of printed forms of certificates and stubs, as follows:

[Stub.]	[Certificate.]
No. —.	No. —. County (or city) of ——, —— day of ——, 188–. The Commonwealth of Virginia owes ——, of —— county, (or city,) Virginia, in consideration of money loaned her to meet a casual deficit in the revenue and to redeem previous liabilities of the State, under act of —— day of ——, 1880, —— dollars, payable on demand, without interest, at the office of the treasurer of Virginia, on presentation of this certificate by said —— in person, at the rate of one for two, or receivable at par by all collectors of taxes for any and all taxes on real or personal property assessed against the above-named lender for which he is not delinquent, if presented within six months from this date, and not otherwise. Not transferable. —— ——, Auditor.
[Name of lender.]
[Date of issue.]
[Amount of certificate.]
[Amount of cash received.]

Said stubs and checks shall be signed by the auditor in person or by stencil, and numbered serially, beginning with No. 1, for each county (or city) and the number of such for each county (or city) shall be at least equal to the number of land owners and property-holders therein. On or before the 1st day of July the several clerks of the county and corporation courts of this Commonwealth shall execute and forward to the auditor of the State a bond in the penalty of $10,000, with security approved by the judge of the county or corporation court of which they are respectively clerks, conditioned faithfully to perform the duties imposed upon such clerk by the provisions of this act, and to account for and pay over to the treasurers of their respective counties on the first of every month, beginning August 1, 1881, all moneys received under this act. Accompanying said temporary-loan books the auditor shall furnish to said clerks printed advertisements—at least five for every election precinct in their respective counties or cities—as follows:

"To all good citizens of the county (or city) of ——, State of Virginia:

"The Commonwealth of Virginia, in order to meet a casual deficit in the revenue, and in order to redeem existing liabilities of the State, desires to borrow from her citizens a sum sufficient to meet said casual deficit and redeem said liabilities, and solicits from the citizens of this county (or city) subscriptions to a temporary loan. Every citizen of this county (or city) is invited to subscribe to said loan.

"Subscriptions to any amount not exceeding in any instance the amount of taxes annually assessed against the land and personal property of the subscriber for which he is not delinquent are solicited from the citizens of this county (or city.) Any person subscribing to said loan will apply to the clerk of the county (or corporation) court of this county, (or city,) and upon the payment in cash of his subscription to said clerk will receive a certificate of indebtedness dated upon the day of such subscription, acknowledging the liability of the State to him for an amount twice as large as his subscription, payable on presentation of said certificate by him in person at the treasury at the rate of one for two, or receivable at par by all collectors of taxes for any or all taxes on real or personal property assessed against him for which he is not delinquent if presented within six months from its date, and not otherwise. Not transferable.

"—— ——, Auditor."

Upon receipt of said advertisements said clerks shall immediately post the same at the court-house doors of their respective courts and in at least three public places in each voting-precinct of their respective counties, (or cities.) A similar advertisement shall be inserted by the auditor in some paper published in each of the cities having a corporation court, and in every county in which a paper is published, beginning July 1, 1881, at least once a week for eight weeks, and inviting subscriptions to said loan.

And any person or corporation so desiring may apply directly to the treasurer of the State to subscribe to said loan, and upon the payment in cash of his or their subscription shall receive from the auditor a certificate such as is hereinbefore described, provided the same shall not exceed the amount of taxes on real and personal property assessed against him on and after 1st February, 1881. The clerk receiving such book shall receipt for the same and state in said receipt the number of certificates therein. Upon application of any subscriber and payment in cash of his subscription, the clerk of the court to whom such payment is made shall fill up the first blank certificate upon his book with the date of payment, the name and residence of the subscriber, and an amount double the subscription. On the stub he shall enter the same, and the actual amount of cash received. If in making out any certificate he damages the same so that it becomes useless, he shall leave it untorn from the book, obliterating the signature and indorsing the stub, and take the next serial number. If any certificates be lost or stolen from said book he shall forthwith notify the treasurer of his county (or corporation) of the missing numbers and warn him not to receive the same, and shall likewise notify the auditor of the facts concerning said loss or theft, and on the stub of the lost or stolen certificates shall indorse the facts. Upon affidavit of the facts satisfactory to him any clerk may issue a duplicate for a certificate which has been lost or destroyed to the person entitled thereto, and across the face and on the stub of such he shall indorse duplicate of number. The treasurer of the county (or city) shall, on the 1st day of August, 1881, and upon the first of each succeeding month, so long as the temporary-loan books remain in the hands of the clerk, call upon him for his books. The treasurer shall, upon blanks to be furnished him by the auditor, make up a tabulated statement, as follows:

Clerk of the county (or city) of ——, in account with the Commonwealth of Virginia for subscriptions to temporary loan of 188–, for the month of ——:

No. of certificate.	Name of subscriber.	Date of issue.	Amount of certificate.	Amount of cash received.	Redeemed.	Not redeemed.

For the amount of cash received by said clerk he shall write his receipt at the foot of said tabular statement, and shall forward a duplicate of such statement and receipt to the auditor. The clerk shall immediately pay over the sum so received by him to the treasurer upon his tendering said receipt. If he fails so to do, it shall be the duty of the treasurer to move against him and his securities forthwith upon his bond in the court having cognizance of such motions, and to notify the auditor of his default. It shall be the duty of the clerks of the courts to whom said temporary loan books are transmitted by the auditor, on the 1st of July next following their receipt, to return the same to the auditor, together with the receipts of the treasurer, for verification.

The amount of subscriptions to said loan received in any county (or city) shall in no case exceed the aggregate of revenue from taxes on land and personal property due the Commonwealth for the current fiscal year by more than 10 per cent., and preference shall be given to the land and property owners of each county and city in receiving subscriptions to said loan. Any clerk who shall falsely and fraudulently issue any temporary-loan certificate authorized by this act, without receiving the cash therefor at the time it issues, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years. The county and city treasurers of this State shall receive at par in payment of taxes on land and personal property assessed in their counties or cities, which are not delinquent, the certificates aforesaid issued by the clerk of their county or corporation when the same are presented by the person to whom they were issued, or his agent, in payment of his taxes on real or personal property. Said treasurer shall arrange all such certificates redeemed by him according to their serial numbers, and return the same, with his accounts, to the treasurer of the State. The treasurer of the State shall receive at par, in payment of any taxes assessed on or after February 1, 1881, due to the Commonwealth which are payable to him directly by law, whether such taxes be delinquent or not, temporary-loan certificates issued by the auditor, as hereinabove provided.

Provided, however, That the aggregate of temporary-loan certificates issued directly from the office of the auditor for subscriptions to the treasurer of the State under this act shall not exceed $1,000,000. Any treasurer who shall fail to move in the proper court against any clerk who is delinquent for ten days in paying over on the 1st of the month the amount of temporary loan subscribed for the previous month shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500; and he and his securities upon his official bond shall be liable for the amount due by said clerk; and the county and city treasurers of this State and their securities shall forthwith appear before the court which took their bonds, and so alter the same as to make them embrace their liability under this act; and they shall forward to the auditor a certificate of the clerk that said bonds have been so altered. The clerk receiving said subscriptions shall be entitled to a commission of —— per cent. on all subscriptions received by him under this act, and may deduct the same from such receipts in accounting with the treasurer.

16. All necessary expenses incurred in the execution of this act shall be paid out of moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the warrants of the auditor of public accounts drawn upon the treasurer on the order of the board of sinking-fund commissioners.

17. It shall be the duty of the officers conducting the election at the several places for holding elections in the State, as provided by law, on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November next, to prepare a separate ballot-box, in which shall be deposited the ballots of the qualified voters of the State who shall desire to vote upon this act. Ballots shall be respectively as follows: "For the act;" "Against the act." The ballots so cast shall be deemed and taken as a vote for or against this act. All persons entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly shall have the right to vote "for" or "against" the act.

The manner of receiving and canvassing the ballots cast at such election on the question of the adoption and rejection of this act, and making returns and abstracts of the results thereof, shall conform in all respects to the regulations prescribed by the general election laws of this State, except that the certificates of the judges in this respect shall be as follows:

"We hereby certify that at the election held on the —— day of November, 1880, —— votes were cast 'for the act' and —— were cast 'against the act.'

"——, ——,
"——, ——,
"——, ——."

And provided further, That the commissioners of election shall make on a separate sheet an abstract of said votes for and against the act, which abstract shall be duly signed by said commissioners and certified to the secretary of the Commonwealth.

And if from such returns and abstract of votes it shall appear that a majority of those voting at said election have voted in favor of said act, then it shall be the duty of the secretary of the Commonwealth to certify the same to the governor, who shall immediately make proclamation thereof by publication in one or more newspapers published in the city of Richmond, having the largest circulation in the country, and from and after the date of such proclamation all the foregoing provisions of this act shall be in full force and virtue.

18. All acts and parts of acts in conflict or inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

19. This act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business; it is getting late in the day.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If the Senator from Rhode Island were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON, (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to announce his pair with his colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. VOORHEES, (when his name was called.) At the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to announce again my pair with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,

Butler,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sewell,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to follow the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] into the domain of cheap and vulgar jokes. He is the sole judge of what is fit for his lips, and with his judgment I do not presume to interfere. If he thinks he has fitted himself for his senatorial duties by the perusal of the comic almanac rather than of the Constitution of the United States, he knows the extent of his own intellectual capacity and the correctness of his own taste. The miserable jest which he thought fit to bring in here originated with the low comedy of the lesser theaters, and has descended from the low comedy of the lesser theaters to scurrilous newspapers, from the scurrilous newspapers to the drinking shops. Is it possible that it has descended from the drinking shops to the Senator from Virginia? The Senator has undertaken to put in my mouth and to deal with a statement which not only I never made, but which I again and again and again and again disavowed in his hearing yesterday. I never said that the proceedings of that side of the Chamber or even that the purposes of that side of the Chamber had anything in them either of treason or of revolution, and I do not say it now. I said that a certain doctrine which I was sure the gentleman who uttered it did not couple with any such purpose, and which had to his mind no such character, in my judgment was replete with treason and with revolution. I was dealing with the logical consequences of a doctrine, and not presuming to discuss the public conduct of any gentleman on this floor; and that I stated with as much clearness of language and as much directness of speech as I could command yesterday. I was but repeating precisely what Mr. Webster said in this Hall many years ago. He declared that there was no power either of foreign force or of domestic violence which could overthrow our institutions, but that the only thing which could do it would be the refusal of the component bodies which make up the Government of this country to perform their constitutional functions. I say that again. I do not say—whether filibustering be right or wrong, whether it be logical or illogical, whether it be in accordance with the duty of Senators or not—that the obtaining delay by that process is justly to be imputed to any gentleman as a wrong. I have done it myself in both Houses of Congress formerly and recently. But I do say that the announcement that an act expressly and in terms committed to the power of this Senate by the Constitution shall never be performed unless the minority of the Senate can dictate the quality of that act (which I understand to be in substance the announcement of the Senator to whom I was replying) is replete with revolution and with treason. It is a refusal by the persons whose act is necessary to the continual operation of the machinery of the Constitution to perform the political duty which the Constitution imposes upon them. I say that again.

Now, Mr. President, I wish also to disclaim for myself the doctrine imputed to this side of the Chamber by the honorable Senator from Virginia in another respect. He claims, as I understand him, that the Senator or the Senate which votes for an executive officer thereby necessarily indorses all the opinions and all the actions of that executive officer on every political question whatever, provided they relate to issues which are now living and practical issues before the country. I do not so understand it. If I correctly understand the financial opinions of both the gentlemen proposed as the principal officers of the Senate, I do not agree with them. I have voted in a very much stronger case than the selection of a mere executive officer, the selection of chairmen of committees of this body, for six democrats, and they hold their offices by my vote at this moment. Does any one of those distinguished gentlemen, does my friend from Delaware, who sits opposite me, suppose that in accepting that office in consequence of my vote and that of my associates he was pledging us to an agreement with him in his political opinions?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to an answer if you want to give one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say, in reference to that, everybody knows that the Senator voted for six members of the democratic party for chairmen of committees in obedience to a courtesy which had obtained and become the common law of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And therefore not a question of personal preference or personal regard on the part of the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Massachusetts, nor was it done from any other motive than simply to carry out and recognize a courtesy existing in this body.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly. I should add that I agree with the honorable Senator from Delaware, except that I hope he will consider that it was to some extent an expression of personal regard as well from the Senators on this side of the Chamber; but he agrees with me in holding that it was by no means an indorsement of his political view on any particular question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I do not wish to do so inconveniently at all. While I do not admit the correctness of his position——

Mr. HOAR. I think I must decline to yield. I do not want to debate this subject.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator called on me and I should like him to allow me——

Mr. HOAR. I will allow you.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think I might possibly agree with the correctness of the opinion indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts as he has expressed it; but I propound this question to him: When an alliance is made between political parties, an alliance in form between the readjuster party and the republican party, I ask him if in all good conscience there has not been a coalition and an agreement of views entered into, a compromise of opinions, whereby whatever of fault or sin attaches to the one has become absolutely incorporated into and identified with the other?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. I answer the question propounded by the Senator from Delaware with an absolute negative. It never occurred to anybody to impute impropriety even when the democrats put six republicans as chairmen of important committees of this body, and when the republicans put six democrats as chairmen of important committees of this body, or to impute that we were undertaking even in clothing them with legislative power to indorse their opinions? How, then, can it be said that in the mere selection of an executive officer having nothing to do with legislation, or simply a recording officer, or an officer to execute order within the limits of this Chamber, there was any departure from the opinions which we had previously entertained?

Why, Mr. President, the republicans retained in office as the chief office next to the Secretary of the Senate Mr. McDonald, a life-long democrat, never supposing for a moment that they were indorsing his opinions. When Mr. McDonald died the republican party elected his son, who now sits at the side of the Secretary of the Senate, himself a well-known and accomplished democrat, who I hope and believe the republicans will keep in the service.

If we may do these things from mere courtesy, as in the case of our committees; if we may do these things from a mere sense of our convenience, as in the case of our clerks and several cases of important offices under the Sergeant-at-Arms, can we not do the same thing when the Senate is made up of three parties and we know it is impossible that the public business shall proceed at all unless the organization of the Senate is completed from more than one of those three parties?

Mr. President, it is too late for the democratic party, whatever party may criticise this action, to plant itself on any such doctrine. In the year 1851 the first great national triumph of the anti-slavery cause in this country was won by a coalition between the democrats and the free-soil party, so called in my native State of Massachusetts. Mr. Boutwell, a democrat of the democrats, pledged to the enforcement of the fugitive-slave law, pledged to all the compromise measures, so called, a national Union democrat, was elected to the office of governor of Massachusetts by the united vote of those two parties, and Mr. Sumner was sent to the Senate. Mr. Chase was elected in the same way from the State of Ohio; John P. Hale was elected in the same way from the State of New Hampshire. And what American, what lover of liberty, what lover of an honest and fair vote in the length and breadth of this land would wipe out of the political history of this country the election of Salmon P. Chase, of Charles Sumner, and of John P. Hale?

Mr. President, I put again the question which the honorable Senator from Illinois put so much better: Does the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance of the last session or his distinguished associate on that committee, now not a member of this body, from the State of New York, does any Senator on the other side entertaining the views which are known as the hard-money doctrine in relation to the most distinct and important living issue before the American people suppose that in voting for the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, as he did when it was organized in the interest of the democratic party, suppose or admit for a moment that he indorsed the opinions on those questions of the gentlemen whom he helped elect to those places?

When the democratic party, in the face of its past action, undertakes to lecture us for organizing the Senate in the interest of that one dearest constitutional right of American freemen, the right to cast an honest ballot and have it honestly counted, there is but one sufficient answer to the lecture: "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I desire to read what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said yesterday, and in the same connection to read the remark of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] which called this declaration forth, and in order that we may get them in proper order I will read first what the Senator from Georgia said, and then the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. Prior to that let me read the declaration of the Senator from Pennsylvania not now in his seat [Mr. CAMERON] as to what the purpose of the gentlemen on that side was. Let me read that as part of the proceeding. It is found in this morning's RECORD, containing yesterday's proceedings.

> I beg leave to inject just a few words into the Senator's speech, which is a much abler one than I can make, I know. I want to say now, and I want the Senator to understand and I want the country to understand, that while we concede the gentlemen who are here in position to be good and proper men, we think we have just as good and proper men, and we propose to put them in. It seems to be a question of endurance; and being so we may as well "sit it out" now.

That was the declaration of the Senator from Pennsylvania. After that the Senator from Georgia made this reply:

> Well, we will try and see whether we can endure as long as you can on this issue. We feel that we are right about it; we feel that you have now nearly all the officers of the Union and a minority of the voters of the Union, and we feel that it is our duty to stand by the few we have left, and let me tell you now we intend to do it and we accept the issue that is tendered, if it is a question of endurance.

There is the declaration of the Senator from Georgia, and let us see how the Senator from Massachusetts characterized that. Turn over to the next page of the RECORD, and read what was said. That was the simple declaration of the Senator from Georgia: "We have as much physical endurance as you; if you put it on the platform of physical endurance, then we accept the issue." The gage was thrown down by the republicans, and only by the Senator from Georgia accepted, and the remark——

Mr. HOAR. You have not read the whole of what the Senator from Georgia said.

Mr. JOHNSTON. How much do you want me to read? I will read it all if you wish.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator wishes to state that question fairly I wish him to read from the close of the first paragraph on the second column of the eighth page: "If you are not ready to do that, then we will invite you to adjourn."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well, I will read that:

> We are ready at every moment to go into executive session and do the proper business of the session, the business which you said on that side yesterday was the only proper business to be done. If you are not ready to do that, then we will invite you to adjourn, and if you will not adjourn, we will invite you to go back to the business for which you were called together by your President, and we will continue that operation until we see justice done to the few remaining democrats. We may be here to June; we have till December.

That was the declaration, and let us see the language of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts used in regard to that simple declaration. Let me read it:

> But I was dealing with another question. I say that the honorable Senator from Georgia has in my judgment affirmed the most unconstitutional doctrine, full of treason in substance, ever uttered within the walls of this Chamber by the lips of any Senator, when he declares in reference to any act which the Constitution of this country commits to the power of the Senate, as it expressly does the power to elect its own officers, that the Senate shall never be permitted to proceed to take action unless it will assent to act as he and his associates in the minority think it should.

There is his declaration that this is unconstitutional doctrine, full of treason in substance.

Mr. HOAR. Now, the Senator will perceive, whether that be a sound or unsound declaration, that it contains nothing about the proceeding of gentlemen on the other side. If the Senator will look at the tenth page he will see that I several times restated that. Down at the lower part of the first column on the tenth page the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] said:

I rather regret that the honorable Senator has found it consistent with his sense of propriety to use some expressions that fell from him, where he states that the doctrine I announced is revolution and treason.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke of the doctrine.

Then I restated it in about the same words in which I stated it before, and then at a later point in the debate the Senator from Virginia himself, now on the floor, said:

Mr. President, I desire to refresh the memory of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the Constitution. As I understood that Senator, he laid down the ground that the proposition—

By which I suppose he meant the statement of purpose—of the Senator from Georgia, or what he stated to be the proposition of this side, is treason. Let me read to that Senator——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I did not say anything about that side. I confined myself to the statement of the Senator from Georgia of a purpose not to permit the Senate to elect its officers if the minority sat here from now until December making dilatory motions. I have not heard the honorable Senator from Virginia announce such a doctrine.

Of course I stand by the proposition as I stated it yesterday and I state it now, but, as the Senator will see, I have not undertaken to say that any act of any Senator in this body is in any degree improper. I was speaking simply of a doctrine, not of a person.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I knew very well that the Senator was in very great haste after he made the first declaration to explain it away if he could.

Mr. HOAR. Not in the least. I reaffirmed it then and reaffirm it now.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When his attention was called to it and the enormity of it was shown, he was very ready to undertake to explain it away.

Mr. HOAR. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I deny that I explained it away or qualified it in the least. I pointed out at last precisely what I had said at first. When the Senator from Georgia began his reply, I said to him that I spoke of the doctrine; to which he replied that he understood me to speak of the doctrine.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The doctrine which the Senator from Georgia announced, and which you understood this side was acting under.

Mr. HOAR. I said nothing about that. I spoke of the doctrine.

Mr. JOHNSTON. You understood no doubt this side was acting together on that doctrine. Now, Mr. President, I have already said the language that the Senator from Massachusetts used was:

The honorable Senator from Georgia has in my judgment affirmed the most unconstitutional doctrine, full of treason in substance, ever uttered within the walls of this Chamber by the lips of any Senator.

That was the language of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and he still says that he is right. I stated before that the Senator has heard and known the fact historically that on the floor of this Senate the doctrine of secession was time and time again announced and upheld; and just twenty years ago nearly all the Senators from one section left the Senate Chamber to execute, to put in operation by force of arms if necessary, the doctrine of secession to the dissolution of the Union.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me. If the democratic party of that time, instead of going down and making their futile attack on the life of the Union, had staid here and refused to perform their constitutional duties, they could have overthrown the Union.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am not talking of what might have been; I am talking of what was done here on this floor. Here on this floor was the right announced to dissolve the Union and to do it by force of arms, and the Senator compares that with our present proceedings and announces that no Senator ever uttered such treasonable doctrine in this Chamber before.

And, Mr. President, as for the reference I made, it was no Jo. Miller joke; the Senator ought to know that it was in the classical drama of England that the character to which I made allusion was portrayed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the President of the United States convened the Senate by a proclamation in an extraordinary session for the purpose of acting upon business that is properly to be done in executive session. I suppose there is no Senator on this floor who would contend for a moment that we would have had this extra session of the Senate to do any other duty than to act upon treaties and nominations; in other words, the President would have been guilty of great folly to have called it for any other purpose. We met for that purpose, and it was a call that is usually made at the end of a Congress. It was proper that it should have been made.

The President sent to this body the nominations for his Cabinet. They could not have been acted on without committees if a single objection had been made. Anxious to make no issues with the incoming administration, but to give it a fair opportunity, we waived by unanimous consent all objection and confirmed the Cabinet and a number of other officers who were nominated; but we could not go on with the regular business of the session until the committees of the Senate were organized, because we have to refer treaties and nominations to committees.

The democrats at the time held the majority in the Senate. They moved forward in the usual way for the organization of the committees. We sought no delay; we sought to take no advantage; we sought to go forward with the business which the President had convened us to attend to.

How were we met by the republican side? We were met with a determined opposition to the organization of the Senate until they could have elected a number of Senators where there were vacancies and get them here; and to carry into effect that purpose they filibustered from day to day in this Chamber at this session. We sat here doing all we could to organize the committees of the Senate and go forward with the business of the session. We were prevented by the dilatory motions made from the republican side of the House. Those dilatory motions were interposed from day to day. In other words, the republicans filibustered from day to day for nearly two weeks to prevent the organization of the committees, without which we could not proceed with the regular business of the Senate. It was all right then on that side; there was nothing treasonable in that, nothing revolutionary in that. It was proper, it was commendable, because it suited the interest of that side.

Finally we reached the point where the vacancies in the Senate were all filled. Up to about that time there had been great doubt as to how the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] would vote. It was ascertained finally that he would vote with the republican side. We could then have turned around and filibustered, and prevented the organization of the committees. Would we have been justified in doing that for as long a time as you filibustered? Would it have been treasonable in us to do the same as you did for the same length of time? I suppose we would have had that right without being guilty of treason; but as we were very careful not to commit treason we waived the right and did not follow your precedent, for in doing so we would have been obstructing the legitimate business of the Senate; we would have been keeping it here in session without the committees, as you did by filibustering to prevent the appointment of the committees. We did not choose to obstruct the legitimate business of the Senate a single day; and the first hour that you were here with the power, you were permitted without any dilatory motions on our part to move forward and organize the committees which gave you the control

After you had done this and proceeded with two or three sessions, a proposition was brought forward from your side of the House to change the officers of the Senate, to set aside the present officers, and by resolution appoint other gentlemen in their places. No Senator in this Chamber will pretend to say that such a change of officers is at all necessary to the transaction of the business for which we were convened by the proclamation of the President. The Senate is now fully organized and thoroughly equipped, with all the committees and machinery necessary for the orderly and proper transaction of business.

At this stage the proposition comes, as already stated, from your side to change these officers. We give you reasons why it should not be done. We state to you that when the democrats were in power two years ago, and they reorganized the Senate, they retained nearly half of the republican officers in their positions, so that to-day you have about half the officers.

We appealed to you by saying that it was only a few days ago that even you knew that the Senator from Virginia would vote with you. These officers did not know it. They have had no time to secure places for themselves, so that they might be in a condition to provide for the wants of their families, but you propose at once to turn them out, to send them adrift without employment. We contended that you ought not to do this. Usually the officers elected at the commencement of a December session serve for two years, until the commencement of a December session. These, elected in December, would be entitled, under the usage as constantly in practice for a long period, to continue to serve until Congress is convened next December. You seek, therefore, to set them aside not only under these circumstances of great hardship but in violation of the usual practice of the Senate in such cases. You seek to reorganize the officers of the Senate at an executive session when it has never been the practice to do it. We stand before the country, therefore, in the position of seeking to carry out the established practice of the Senate and in the position of insisting upon simple justice to the officers now in position.

I was discussing this question yesterday and pointing out these hardships and this impropriety when the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] rose and interrupted me, and he gave us notice in effect that your side intend to stay here until you have accomplished your object by the appointment of your officers. He said:

I want the country to understand, that while we concede the gentlemen who are here in position to be good and proper men, we think we have just as good and proper men, and we propose to put them in. It seems to be a question of endurance; and being so we may as well "sit it out" now.

To that I replied, accepting the challenge as tendered, saying that we would see if we could have as much endurance. In concluding my remarks on that subject, after stating that I would invite you into executive session, and if you would not do that, then invite you to adjourn, I said:

We will invite you to go back to the business for which you were called together by your President, and we will continue that operation until we see justice done to the few remaining democrats. We may be here to June; we have till December.

That is the expression that my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said yesterday and in substance reiterates to-day is so rank with treason. Why? Because he construes it to mean that the minority intend to sit here and finally defeat the action of the Senate in a matter where he says, if I understand him, that the majority have a right to act. He says it is the doctrine contained in that expression that is treasonable. I confess I was very much astonished to hear that remark, and I then said to my friend, while I know he is no traitor and no revolutionist, his position carried out and compelled me to prove him a traitor. In other words, this doctrine carried to its legitimate sequence makes him a traitor for what he has already done in the Senate, not a traitor in fact. To that he replied that it had grown into a custom by dilatory motions to prevent action for a time, but if it goes to the extent of defeating action, then it becomes treason and revolution.

Contrast that expression of mine with the conduct of the Senators on that side before the end of the last Congress, and how does the account of revolution and treason stand between us? First, take my expression. This Congress, which is understood, I suppose, to commence from the 4th of March, the time when the Forty-sixth Congress adjourned, has two years to serve. This particular Senate has two years to sit, and it has the power within that time to reorganize its officers if it chooses to do so. I did not say we would stay here either till the 1st of June or of December. I accepted the challenge saying that we would endure as long as you will. I said we might be here until June, and we have till December. What does that mean? We have no business session of Congress to intervene between now and December. We obstruct none of the business of the country by remaining here till December. It is a simple question of personal convenience to the Senate whether we will extend this executive session till the first Monday in December, when the regular session will convene for business, and extend it on the proposition of that side of the House to do a thing that has never been done before; that it is not the custom of the Senate to do; and that we have shown for obvious reasons it is entirely improper to do at this time.

That, according to the Senator from Massachusetts, is treason. To say that we will subject the Senators on the other side to a little personal inconvenience in remaining here as long as they choose to remain, or when the taunt of endurance is held out to us to say that we can endure as long as you can, is treasonable. Have you not from the first Monday in next December to the end of the Forty-seventh Congress within which to do this job? Then we do not obstruct any legitimate business of the Senate by delaying you by dilatory motions if we choose to do so. We say to you every hour, "We are ready to go with you into executive session and do the business that a republican President has called us here to do." Why will you not do it? You are in power now by the aid of the Senator from Virginia. Why do you stand here and retard the necessary business of the country in order that you may displace a few honest, upright officers, admitted by you to be good and competent men, and put a few others in their places?

I have a right to this extent to speak of matters that may come before us in executive session. The fact that a nomination has been made is not a secret; the fact that there has been a confirmation is not a secret. I am authorized to say that there are now before us nominations for public ministers to the courts abroad; that there is now before us a nomination for a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; that there is now a nomination before us for the circuit judge of the fifth district, in which several of us reside, where there is now a vacancy, and the business of the country is suffering for want of a judge. There is also a nomination before us to fill a vacancy in the Court of Claims. Why do you not go on and act upon the nominations and fill these places? Why will you not confirm your foreign ministers? Why will you not act upon the nomination made by your President of a judge of the Supreme Court, where there is a vacancy to-day calling for his presence to discharge the high functions of that position? Why will you not fill the vacant benches in the fifth judicial circuit of the United States, and in the Court of Claims, and let the business go on? Because you judge that it is more important to stay here and elect a Secretary of the Senate and a Sergeant-at-Arms, putting out a little remaining handful of faithful democrats. If you choose to make that issue before the country and to meet it, we are not afraid to meet it. We accept that.

Mr. MORGAN. The little price of a bribe.

Mr. BROWN. I will say nothing about the reasons why you must neglect these important affairs of State and refuse to go on and confirm officers to do these high duties. I said yesterday that while the air was full of rumors of bargain and sale and bartering and "capital understanding" I knew nothing about them. For the honor of your party and the honor of the Senator from Virginia I appeal to you not to take this unwise step, for by doing it you might do great injustice. If there be no bargain, no contract, no "capital understanding" that General MAHONE is to have the patronage of Virginia and is to have certain officers of the Senate, still if you remain here and keep the Senate in session and neglect the important duties of the session to seat these friends of his here it will be a little hard to convince the country probably that there was not at least a "capital understanding" about it, and you will have to meet the responsibility. You who are the debt-paying party, who have made so much boast of it, who are staying here and defeating the confirmation of foreign ministers and high functionaries and judges, do it to put a man into office who is, to say the least of it, a partial repudiationist. If you want to go before the country on that issue, we are willing to meet you there.

Mr. BECK. There are eighty-seven important nominations and four treaties now pending.

Mr. BROWN. The honorable Senator from Kentucky informs me that he has gone to the docket and looked, and that we have eighty-seven nominations and four treaties now pending. A great proportion of these are very important nominations, of the character that I have just mentioned. Here they are, and the functions of the Government cannot be properly performed without their confirmation. At the end of the last Congress a large number of names of persons lay upon our table who were nominated for places, and you did not permit them to be confirmed, and why? Because it did not suit your purpose to have some of them acted upon. There came in the treason, under the doctrine laid down by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. Those high officials had been nominated by the President of the United States; the duties of those officers were important; the country needed their services. On the democratic side we proposed to go with you into executive session, and to act upon the nominations, but you refused, and you filibustered and would not permit us to go there, and about one hundred nominations, I believe it was, a large number anyway, fell at the end of the Congress on account of your filibustering. What do you say to that as treason? We reached near the end of the session; we moved again and again to go into executive session and act upon these important matters, and you declined; and as you were in the minority you filibustered to the end of the session, and you absolutely prevented it. When filibustering would not do, you sat in your seats in the Senate and refused to answer the roll-call on the yeas and nays on any question that might come up that related to any controversy then existing between the two parties. You justified all that then; you were not obstructing any important matters in your estimation. Oh, no; you were not even preventing the majority from going on under the Constitution and doing important duties as you understand it, I suppose.

Now the Constitution is held up to us; our oath of office is held up; it is said the majority have a right to change the officers of the Senate; that it is a constitutional right, and that we are not performing our duties under our oaths as Senators if we throw any obstacles in your way. What do you think of that compared with your conduct the last few days of the Forty-sixth Congress? If we are wrong now at the commencement of this Congress, when you have two years to correct the wrong in, or to do the duty you say you ought to perform as the majority, how did it stand with you when you filibustered till the end of the session and prevented this action, and left us in round numbers one hundred nominations not acted on, and with the country suffering for the want of filling the places.

If there be treason in this matter, who have been the traitors? If it be not treasonable to filibuster for a little while at a time, as we may be doing, and if it is treason to prevent action as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts lays down the doctrine, then you committed it to the fullest extent when you prevented action by filibustering till the end of the Congress, and the nominations and other important acts fell for want of action. This, the Senator from Massachusetts being the judge, was rank treason and revolution, and the Senator from Massachusetts and the republican party were the traitors and revolutionists. I am glad his doctrine is wrong. Its repudiation by his party is the only escape before the country from the guilt of this high crime.

But let us see whether in fact we are violating the Constitution on this question. Much was said yesterday evening on that subject. I find in the Constitution of the United States in article 1, section 5, these words:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

There, then, the authority is given to each House to make its own rules. That authority is given by the Constitution of the United States. The Senate has proceeded under that authority and made rules. Among those rules is one that authorizes any Senator, when he thinks proper, to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Among those rules is another one that authorizes any Senator, when he thinks proper, to move that the Senate do now adjourn; another that authorizes a Senator to move to lay any pending proposition on the table; another that authorizes a Senator to move to postpone to a future day. These are constitutional motions. The Constitution of the United States says the Senate shall have power to make its rules, and it has made these rules for the government of the conduct of its members. Are we on this side guilty of treason when we act within these rules? Is it treason to make a motion to adjourn any particular number of times, when it is a legal motion under the rules of the Senate authorized by the Constitution of the United States? How often may you make it on that side and commit no treason, and how often must we make it on this side before it becomes treason?

How are we violating our oaths of office as a minority to impose legal objections to what we consider pernicious measures? Has it come to this in the Senate of the United States that a majority, and a majority of one, (that majority believed by many to have been obtained by questionable means, whether it was so or not,) shall turn upon the minority and say, "You are traitors if you interpose constitutional restraints upon our will, or if you enforce the rules of the Senate to prevent what you consider improper legislation?" What protection has a minority against bad legislation and the tyranny of a majority if it is not in resorting at certain times to all the delay that the Constitution and the rules of the body permit? Where is the wrong in it? When we were in the majority it was all right on your part, but when you are in the majority our oaths under the Constitution are appealed to, and we are asked how we can sit here and for a day prevent the consummation of the will of the majority.

We are told the Constitution of the United States says that the Senate may appoint its officers. So it does. Then it is said we violate the Constitution if we throw any obstruction in the way of reorganization whenever a majority of one of the Senate wants to reorganize it. We reply that we have a right, as the Senate has good officers, to throw every obstruction in the way that the Constitution and rules of the Senate authorize us to use.

In a word, then, you have prevented the business of the country from being done by filibustering. You have filibustered until the end of a Congress, and caused one hundred nominations of your own President to fail of action because you filibustered. You have prevented other important legislation by filibustering until the Congress expired. We at the commencement of a session, for the reasons already given and under the circumstances already stated, resist by constitutional means and under the rules of the Senate a change in certain officers; and if we say that we may stay here until June or December, a time when there is a recess of Congress, rather than permit you to do this act that we think so unjust, that sentiment is highly treasonable.

As the honorable Senator from Massachusetts quoted Scripture awhile ago he will excuse me for saying: Take the beam out of your own eye and you can then better see how to take the mote out of your brother's. It is a beam with you; it is large treason on your part. You held up the business to the end of the Congress; you obstructed the business of the session; you prevented action upon important measures that ought to have been acted upon. That was a big beam; but if we filibuster a little at the commencement of a Congress to take care of our friends upon a question where we are right, then you say it is treasonable. I say it is a small mote compared with what you have done.

I deny the doctrine laid down by my honorable friend from Massachusetts that it is treasonable or in any way criminal if I had said we would stay till the 1st of December. I now say that we will stay as long as you do. If I had said till the 1st of December, which is simply the recess until the business session of Congress commences, I deny that there was anything treasonable, or wrong, or unusual in it.

Therefore I say that my friend was entirely wrong in the announcement of the doctrine; and I think he was unkind somewhat in his reply, without intending to be so, to use such an expression. However that might have been, I repudiate the doctrine as wrong, and I say you cannot maintain it upon any principle or any practice. You cannot justify your conduct and condemn ours. But if the Senator from Massachusetts still insists upon his doctrine, then I submit it to the whole Senate that I have proven, if his rule be correct, that he is a traitor and a revolutionist; and that the whole republican side of the Senate, in obstructing and preventing, until the end of the last Congress, important acts it was our duty to perform, were guilty of the high treason defined in his code. There is no escape from the conclusion; and I do not fear that my position will be controverted seriously by any Senator on the republican side of this Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] until the first Monday in December, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to postpone until the first Monday in December.

Mr. HARRIS. True, but my motion is in order to lay the resolution on the table pending the motion to postpone, and I make it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves to lay the resolution on the table and asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON, (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called.) The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desired me to state that he is paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I announced yesterday that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] was absent because of serious illness. He is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS,] and that pair will continue so long as my colleague is not able to be here.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Morgan,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Lamar,	Slater,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Walker.

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Hale,	McDill,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sawyer,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Butler,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Mahone,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,	Williams.

So the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to lay the resolution on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay." I announce once for all that my colleague is paired with the Senator from Maryland on all questions that come up of a political nature to-day.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] until he is present in the Chamber.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GROOME. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If the Senator from Rhode Island were here, I am informed that he would vote "nay," and I should certainly vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Slater.
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,

NAYS—26.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—24.

Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Butler,	Groome,	McPherson,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Vest,

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BECK. Yesterday morning I endeavored to direct the attention of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who has charge of the present movement, to the fact that a gentleman by the name of Riddleberger is perhaps not the sort of public man that he would desire to patronize. I think the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] developed the fact to-day that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts would have to abandon many of his former principles if he shows an uncommon zeal in placing a gentleman of that sort of politics in high position in the Senate in order to obtain for his party or his principles power in Congress. As that fact has now been developed, I want to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Massachusetts, whom I have always adhered to when I could, as he knows, earnestly, and in whose teachings I have had great confidence, that I think he had better take a little more time, after the developments of to-day, to consider whether he had not better change front in regard to the resolution nominating Mr. Riddleberger with his repudiation record and bill and substitute somebody else. I was about to suggest whether it would not be well to adjourn so that the Senator from Massachusetts might think over it to-night after what has been said.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. BECK. I only desire to make that suggestion now.

Mr. DAWES. Two considerations move me to decline the suggestion of my friend, which comes, I know, from that kind relation which has always existed between him and myself. The first is that there does not occur to me now any debt of the Senate that this gentleman would have any power to readjust at all, and that his functions, if he shall be elected, will be altogether apart from anything connected with the particular matter discussed by the Senator from Virginia. The other consideration is that we elect a Secretary first; and if the Senator will join with me and go as far as the election of a Secretary this afternoon I will consider the suggestion after that and see whether we had better reflect as to the other officer.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to break into the harmony of the general proceedings which were resolved on in solemn caucus by the republican party, of which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is the organ. The harmony of the whole would be disturbed. While I agree with the Senator that there is no debt of the Senate to be paid to Mr. Riddleberger, there are some suggestions afloat that there are debts of the republican party whereby they got control of the committees that have to be paid to Mr. Riddleberger. I say to the Senator he had better take time and see whether it is better to pay them or to repudiate them. As you are dealing with a repudiator perhaps it would be well to repudiate that debt for the honor of the Senator whose great reputation as a debt-payer has never been doubted.

Mr. DAWES. I say to the Senator that we do not intend to readjust any of our debts, but we intend to pay them in the full according to the letter.

Mr. BECK. According to the bargain; and that is what I object to. I do not want to be a party to that bargain.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BECK. I want the Senator to take time until to-morrow morning to see if he does not think it is best not to carry out that bargain. But that is not what I rose to say.

I rose to say that, as the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] yesterday called to the attention of the Senate, the object for which we were called together by a republican President is stated in these words:

Whereas objects of interest to the United States—

Not to Mr. Riddleberger, nor to a few friends—

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

That is the purpose for which we were called together. Many important nominations have been made and sent to us by the Executive. No communication has been made to us that either the present Secretary, or the present Sergeant-at-Arms, or any officer of the Senate who now serves us is not ready and willing to perform his duties and is not performing them well at this time, or that a change of the officers of the Senate needs to be considered. It is equally well known that none of those things are usually, perhaps never, except upon resignation or the occurrence of a vacancy, considered at an executive session. It is equally well known that none of the present employés of the Senate had any reason to believe that any disturbance of their present relations to the Senate would be sought at this session, and therefore they have had no sort of opportunity to make preparation for their future wants or necessities; and it is evident that no injury can possibly ensue to anybody if these gentlemen should be retained, especially as the hundred and odd thousand office-holders all over the country are republicans. Heretofore when republicans were sought to be removed as clerk, secretary, or sergeant-at-arms, every Department of the Government was open to them and they were given other places at once. They not only knew it six months in advance, but the doors of the Departments stood open to every one of them the very moment they left these Halls.

If I were to cite the speeches made two years ago, even at a legislative session, by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and other distinguished Senators now on this floor at the time some changes were made, when the men knew six months before that the changes would be made——

Mr. FARLEY and others. A year before.

Mr. BECK. Yes; a year before. Then these Senators spoke of our revolutionary character, of our greed, of the upsetting of all decency by the democrats when we sought to place in office a few men; and by the way we left and kept half that you had; I happen to serve on a committee, the Committee on Appropriations, where the clerk and messenger were retained; and my distinguished friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] now the chairman of that committee, will retain them still. I allude to Mr. Cleaves, who is the best clerk I ever saw. The messenger is equally good, both were kept through the democratic rule, and both are republicans. Mr. Nixon was kept. The gentleman in charge of the document-room, Mr. Smith, was retained. I could name by the dozen those who were kept by us all the time we held power, as officers of the Senate.

Now this tremendous pressure to remove a few men has to be made and the public business must be obstructed to carry out the orders of a party caucus; the object of the call cannot be carried out, nominations of judges of the Supreme Court, foreign ministers, the collector of the port of New York, and for other positions, cannot be considered, because, forsooth, the Senator from Massachusetts is directed by his caucus to obstruct all the public business and proceedings to provide for Mr. Riddleberger, the republicans having obtained a tie vote in the Senate, with the Vice President in the chair to decide in their favor, in order that Mr. Riddleberger may be provided for. I protest against that sort of filibustering by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I desire to call the Senator's attention to another reason why, out of a decent respect to a very distinguished body of men, we ought to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and I propose to move that we shall do so presently. The senate of New York unanimously passed the following resolutions, signed officially, and sent them to the Senate of the United States officially, directing them to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] officially, and to the Secretary of the Senate officially. They read thus:

Whereas it is officially announced that Hon. William H. Robertson has been appointed collector of the port of New York: Therefore,

Resolved, That while this body will lose the services of one of its ablest and most upright members the country at large will be the gainer by his promotion to another sphere of duty.

Resolved, That the thanks of this body are due and hereby tendered to the President for the nomination of Senator Robertson, and that we cordially join in a request to the Senate of the United States to confirm promptly and heartily the action of the Executive.

To give the republican Senators a chance to comply with the request of the senate of New York, whose unanimous resolutions I have just read, and which will doubtless be laid before us, and to show that we are not guilty of treason, or if we are that the senate of New York is guilty of like treason in proposing to proceed promptly with the public business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. BECK. No; I want to give the Senate the opportunity to proceed with the public business at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on this question.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If I were free to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Call,	George,	Jones,	Slater.
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,	Williams.
Ferry,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Garland,	McPherson,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky has fallen into a delusion which perhaps it is worth the trouble to correct. He is apt, in the zeal with which he follows out his party convictions, to sometimes fall under such delusions as he has to-day. He cannot understand why a Senator upon this floor whom the democracy in his own State have been fighting for a long time and have undertaken to defeat in his election and have failed in that fight, and who has been elected in spite of their opposition—I say that the Senator from Kentucky cannot understand why that Senator is not voting with the men who tried to defeat him, unless it be from some bargain. If one looks at the history of political events and the current of political forces, it would be a marvel if that Senator were found co-operating with the very men who had attempted to defeat not only him personally in his canvass for the Senate, but all the purposes, political and otherwise, which the Senator from Virginia, to whom I allude, had entered into in the political contests of the day. The Senator from Kentucky cannot understand why in a fair political controversy the man to whom he is opposed does not continue to co-operate with him unless there be some bargain.

I say to the Senator from Kentucky distinctly what I think there can be no doubt is the judgment of the American people, that if the Senator to whom he alludes, after the contest with the political forces with whom the gentleman from Kentucky is associated, had been found to-day still co-operating with them, he would have deserved and would have received at the hands of the American people a condemnation for the want of sincerity and honesty in his political action. There is no possible position consistent with honesty of conviction on the part of that Senator that would not keep him away from the Senator from Kentucky, who charges him with entering into a bargain because he does not co-operate with him.

Mr. BECK. Do not put that in my mouth. I never charged the Senator from Virginia with anything; but I have been in trouble as to how Riddleberger, a confederate brigadier, a Hancock elector, and a repudiator, should be picked out for a high office by the Senator from Massachusetts. That is what is troubling me.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator has got over the trouble that his party was afflicted with yesterday, and that was some inconsistency on the part of the Senator from Virginia. If he has got over that, then there is some hope for him in the other matter. The trouble now is that I have offered a resolution for appointing as Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate a person with whom in all particulars I do not agree, and the Senator sees fit to charge me with a bargain; what bargain I do not know. Before he announced that he thought there must be a bargain, I said to the Senator that I did not understand any debt that this man would have to readjust, of the Senate or otherwise; that the duties to which this man would be called if elected had nothing whatever to do with that particular phase of his political faith; and that while I did not agree with him in any respect to that, believing him to be an honest man—and nobody has charged otherwise—and a man capable in every particular to discharge the duties of the office, and it being an office with which that article of his own particular faith had nothing to do whatever, it was quite gratuitous on the part of the Senator to travel out of the record to see if there was not some bargain. That is another delusion into which the Senator has fallen.

Mr. BECK. The thing that bothered me was how he developed his honesty by proposing a bill and passing it through the Virginia Legislature repudiating the State debt; I cannot understand that. Is that the honesty the Senator talks about?

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt of the honesty of the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. You have no right to doubt it.

Mr. DAWES. The personal honesty of that Senator is beyond question; but he has announced upon this floor some of the most perverse and absurd political doctrines that were ever held by mortal in this Chamber.

Mr. BECK. In the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts only.

Mr. DAWES. While I would trust the Senator from Kentucky with everything pertaining to my honor or anything I had in the world, I would just as soon follow the evil one in his religious and moral announcements as the Senator from Kentucky in his political perversities which he announces here on the floor. The Senator from Kentucky would make an excellent officer of the Senate, and if brought forward in a proper way nothing would give me such delight as to record my vote for him; but Heaven forgive me if thereby I should be made responsible for the perverse, absurd, and as I think, wicked political doctrines that he is continually announcing upon this floor.

Another delusion into which the Senator from Kentucky has innocently fallen is the matter which I fully answered yesterday from the record—he has forgotten all about the record—and that is that there is some undue haste about this proceeding. He fell into confusion. I heard Senators prompting him all around there. They were about getting my friend from Kentucky into a puzzle when he said that the political character of the Senate two years ago was changed more than a year before it proceeded to change the officers of the Senate. No political record bears him out in that statement. The fact is it was changed between the 1st of January and the 4th of March of that year, and it was not changed any other time, and was not known at any other time, just as in the present instance——

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DAWES. I am having a little interview with my friend from Kentucky at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senate that came into power on the 4th of March, 1879, was composed of Senators enough to change the complexion of the Senate who were elected in December of the year preceding the meeting of the Senate in March, 1879. The State of California, the State of Oregon, the State of Ohio, the State of Maryland, and two or three other States elected in December, 1877, or January, 1879.

Mr. DAWES. Which are those two or three others?

Mr. FARLEY. I cannot now call them to mind——

Mr. DAWES. So I supposed.

Mr. FARLEY. But they were enough to change the political status of the Senate and make it a democratic body.

Mr. DAWES. No more of the States made choices two years ago before the 1st of December prior to the 4th of March than did a year ago. While two or three States made choice before the 1st of January, the body of the new Senators were elected after the 1st of January, and the same was true a year ago that was true three years ago in that respect. The body of one-third of the new Senators was elected, as I stated, between the 1st of January and the 4th of March prior to the commencement of the senatorial term; and it was not known any more certainly two years ago than it was this year, and in no State, as I said yesterday, was there any doubt. There was no more doubt that the democratic organization was defeated in Virginia than there was that it was defeated in Massachusetts. The result was just as certain; and whatever the result was in Virginia, that was one of the States that happened to elect before the 1st of January; and so far as the result hung upon Virginia, it was known that there was a fierce struggle in Virginia between the democratic party and all those combined who were opposed to it, and those opposed to the democratic party in Virginia prevailed, and the 4th of March came and the power passed out of the hands of the democratic party. Two years ago——

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator is always in the habit, I believe, of interrupting Senators when they get on the floor or I would have no desire to interrupt him now.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not wish to interrupt him now except to ask him one question. Did he know until the meeting of this Senate this spring, on the 4th of March, how the Senator from Virginia was going to vote, with what party? In addition to that, did not the Senator who was elected from Virginia a year ago, or more than a year ago, act with the democratic party and support General Hancock for President in November after his election?

Mr. DAWES. I did not know how the Senator from Virginia would vote, nor did I know how any Senator would vote; but I knew that if the Senator from Virginia was true to his avowed convictions and the platform upon which he was elected and the pledges of the men who elected him, he never would vote with you on the other side.

Mr. BECK. You mean, of course, the Riddleberger bill, do you not?

Mr. DAWES. I mean, if he was true to the statements of the men who elected him that they were determined to make war upon that organization represented in this Senate on the other side of the Chamber. That is all I have to say about that.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. My question is, Was not the nomination of Riddleberger a concession to the lately elected Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE?] Was it not upon his recommendation and at his especial instance that Riddleberger was nominated by the republican caucus for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. DAWES. I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I know no difference in the manner of selecting one man for place in this Senate Chamber as one of its officers and another. I know of no bargain. I know of no concession to one Senator more than to another. I know that the gentlemen whose names I presented in these resolutions were selected in the ordinary way, and so far as I know without the slightest consultation with one Senator more than another.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, my question is one perfectly plain, that a frank man can answer without evasion. He was nominated at the express request of the Senator from Virginia or he was not, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows which, and I simply ask him to have the frankness to state the fact.

Mr. DAWES. I frankly stated, Mr. President, that if he was nominated in any such way as is stated by the Senator from Tennessee, it is without my knowledge or belief.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. The honorable Senator is answered. The Senator will hardly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts consent to be interrupted? This confusion cannot be tolerated.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts will decide whether he will be interrupted or not.

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I am the last man on this floor to interrupt him or any other Senator.

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly in any proper manner, and the Senator from Tennessee will not otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS. Well, I shall be the judge as to the manner of my action here and not the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course not, I understand that.

Mr. DAWES. What does the Senator say?

Mr. HARRIS. I am occupying the floor, if occupying it at all, by the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear the Senator's last remark before this. What was it?

Mr. HARRIS. My remark was that I would be the judge as to my manner and as to what I said, if I occupied the floor at all, and not the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have not assumed to be the judge. I said that the Senator would not do it in any improper way. If the Senator thinks I have not yielded properly, the Senator has only this alternative, to let me go on.

Mr. HARRIS. The question I wanted to ask the Senator from Massachusetts is: Does he intend the Senate to understand him as denying that Riddleberger was nominated for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of this body at the express request and knowing it to be the decided wish of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE?] It is a plain question, and I desire a simple, a frank, and a truthful answer.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator does not expect any answer from me beyond what I know. The Senator has that. If the Senator asks me why I support this man, I can tell him. I support this man for the reason that I believe him a man of ability, of influence, of force, of position to exercise that legitimate power in a cause in which the free ballot in this country in involved. [Applause in the galleries, which was checked by the Presiding Officer.] I believe, sir, and that is the reason why I support him, that he is determined that, so far as in him lies, every man entitled to a vote in his State shall have the free, unembarrassed, and untrammeled right to cast that vote and to have that vote counted as he cast it, and for that great cause and for that great enterprise in which he and those associated with him are engaged, he encounters this virulent opposition, and he draws to his side the support of those who think that, in comparison with this great attainment, what may be his views upon minor and local matters in Virginia fade out of sight.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me with one other question? I will await the answer of the Senator from Massachusetts. [Mr. DAWES nodded.] I beg to know of the Senator from Massachusetts when and through what channel he learned that Riddleberger was so profoundly in favor of a free vote and a fair count? Was it not through the information derived from the lately elected Senator from Virginia, MAHONE? I beg the Senator to answer.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have two answers to make to that simple question. First, suppose it was. [Laughter.] I take his word, the word of the Senator from Virginia, quite as soon as I would that of any man in Virginia found with his heel upon the neck of the poor and defenseless black man struggling for his position and rights. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The Chair will take this occasion to observe to the spectators in the galleries and to those who are upon the floor of the Senate by its courtesy, that expressions of dissent or approbation are against the rules of the Senate, and will be punished by the clearing of the galleries and of the floor. The Chair hopes he will have no occasion to repeat this admonition.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to observe, if the Chair will indulge me in doing so, that we are all delighted to see the large mob that gathers here in search of office; we know they belong to the other side of the Chamber, and we like to see them throng these galleries; but there comes a time when we desire them to keep still. They proclaim their venality louder than is necessary. They are here with their uncles, aunts, cousins, and all their kindred, and we welcome them; but we desire them to observe the courtesy and decency due to this place. I shall move to clear the galleries if this continued disturbance and outrage be not stopped.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Indiana has lost his usual courtesy. The Senator should understand that these galleries are for the American people.

Mr. VOORHEES. While they behave themselves.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to proceed. While it becomes them and it is our duty to see that they shall observe the decorum that becomes this body—and I have no doubt upon reflection they will be quite as ready to do it as any who have thronged these galleries in the last two years—they have, nevertheless, an interest in the controversy now going on of political forces in this country that is not to be stifled or suppressed by any remarks of the Senator from Indiana that they are a mob.

The other answer which I was about to give to the Senator from Tennessee besides the fact that if I had obtained this knowledge from the Senator from Virginia I should have obtained it from as honorable and as reliable a source as any other in the Senate Chamber, was this: I am not blind to the current of political events; I do not turn a deaf ear when those who have been clothed by the Constitution of the United States with the ballot have struggled in vain these long years for the exercise of that right, and whenever they have asserted it have had to wade through blood to the ballot-box; and when I see a body of men in one of these States asserting and maintaining that, however those men may vote, they shall have the free untrammeled right to cast their ballots and assert their power, whether it be with them or against them, it is not necessary for me to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whence I learned these facts, or of the Senator from Tennessee where it is my duty to stand in any such struggle as that.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me a moment further?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts has answered; certainly he has not answered so that I can exactly comprehend; but I will propound my question in yet another form, for I am anxious to obtain the information, and as I recognize in the Senator from Massachusetts the present organ of the republican caucus who must know exactly what that caucus has done and the reasons why it has acted, may I ask that Senator if Riddleberger would have been nominated by the republicans as their candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate but for the republicans knowing that it was the desire of the Senator from Virginia that he should be, and in obedience to the wishes of the Senator from Virginia, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Virginia would act with the republicans in the organization of the Senate?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I despair. The Senator's inability to understand me passes all comprehension of mine. I will, however, disabuse him of some things. He says he recognizes me as the organ of the republican caucus. I am neither now nor have I ever been the organ of any republican caucus. I stand here, sir, as a republican Senator with no other official position, offering myself the resolution now pending. I do not now occupy nor have I ever occupied the high position to which the Senator has assigned me.

I have answered the Senator why I proposed this man's name. I do not speak, I have no authority to speak for any other Senator upon this side of the Chamber or the other. I answer for myself. I find this man possessing the qualities I have indicated and in a work that commends itself, as I have said and I will not repeat, not only to my judgment, but to my sympathy and my co-operation, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall do whatever is in my power to strengthen his hand and that of those who act with him in accomplishing the end that I have indicated.

But now, Mr. President, I wish to turn to the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Missouri will wait until I get through with the Senator from Kentucky I will hold myself subject to his order.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky passed under another delusion, and that was, as I was remarking when I was interrupted, that the democrats waited a whole year after they ascertained that they had the power before they proceeded to oust officers whom they admitted to be faithful public servants. I have told him that the power passed into their hands between the 1st of January and the 4th of March, 1879, and on the 18th day of March of that year Congress assembled, and on the 24th day of March, six days thereafter, without other objection on this side than fair argument, they ousted every one of them, giving them but six days. We are in the 25th day of the month, and Senators on the other side are crying out that we have made undue haste.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question? I understand him to say that the resolution he has offered to the Senate comes from himself personally and not from a caucus. Is that his statement or not?

Mr. DAWES. When I get through with the Senator from Kentucky I will listen to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. DAWES. I will not answer your question now.

Mr. VEST. I affirm that the resolutions come from a republican caucus.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator may take as much from that remark as he pleases. He will not force me to answer him until I get through with the Senator from Kentucky, and then I will answer him.

The Senator from Kentucky says that we have had during these whole two years half of these offices. The Senator is just as far from the facts there as he is in everything else he has stated. Under the present Secretary there are but six republicans in office. One of them is a soldier that it was not deemed wise to dislodge; one of them is the cashier that it was just as wise to retain; two of them are colored laborers; and the other two are old experts who have come down through Mr. Gorham and Mr. Burch to this day. These six are all out of thirty or forty employés under the Secretary.

Now, I say to the Senator from Missouri that while I offered these resolutions, and did not offer them because I was the organ of any man's caucus, they are resolutions which I believe every republican member upon this side of the Senate Chamber intends to support, and to support because they commend themselves to his judgment as resolutions recommending the best and fittest men for these places.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, that is not the question.

Mr. DAWES. That is the answer. [Laughter.] That is the difference.

Mr. VEST. I asked the gentleman this question: Did not those resolutions come from a republican caucus, and did he not offer them here as the organ of that caucus? That is a plain question and admits of a plain answer.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is quite an old politician and has been in a good many caucuses, and he would tell me it was none of my business if I put that question to him.

Mr. VEST. I was never a readjuster and never in a republican caucus, but I have this to say to the gentleman, that I have a right to put the question.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the Senator is reconstructed, if he is not readjusted. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. I was never in a caucus of the republican party. I have asked the gentleman this question, and he can answer it or not.

Mr. DAWES. I answered it a moment ago when I said to the Senator that if I had put that question to him he would have told me it was none of my business.

Mr. VEST. I think not. We have been told again and again, sir, in the last two years, that an irresponsible democratic caucus has proposed certain measures to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Did any republican ever catechise a democrat as to what proceeded in his caucus?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir, again and again.

Mr. DAWES. But we did not get any answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. I want to know from the Senator from Massachusetts whether he offers these resolutinns as the organ of the republican caucus.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator put his question?

Mr. VEST. I want to know from the Senator from Massachusetts whether he does not offer these resolutions as the organ of the republican caucus.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, if the Senator has got his question clear through, I will say to him that if he does not consider himself already answered, I regret to say that the Senator will be anxious some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. DAWES. I am very happy to know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. It is about what I expected from that source.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is not disappointed, then. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. President, I trust that the Senate will proceed to vote upon the resolution pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to postpone the pending resolution until the first Monday in December next, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) Mr. President, it is near dinner hour, and I am sure we shall get in a better humor if we adjourn. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I do not vote for the reason that I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) As has already been stated, my colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] desired me to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest.
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December next, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have not taken any part in the discussion, and have not desired to do so. I have thought that perhaps some reply ought to be made to some things which have been said; but it is late in the afternoon, and I shall not now attempt to reply to the remarks of Senators on the other side who have spoken on this question. I shall proceed, however, to state very succinctly some of the reasons why I shall oppose in every possible way the adoption of the pending resolution.

In the first place it is an unusual proceeding. I have been now for ten years a member of the Senate, and never before, since I have been in the Senate, has there been any attempt at an executive session to go into an election of the officers of this body. The proceeding, therefore, is unprecedented and unusual. That is one of the reasons why I shall oppose it.

In the second place, the resolution proposes, in my opinion, to do an act of great injustice to the employés of the Senate. It has already been stated, it was stated yesterday by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] in terms that I thought would make an impression on the other side, that the employés of the Senate had had no notice and had no reason to suppose that there would be any attempt at the present executive session to displace them from the positions they occupy. I say frankly, so far as the principal officers of the Senate are concerned, that I am under no personal obligation to them. There is not a single employé, either under the Secretary or under the Sergeant-at-Arms, who was employed at my request, and I am therefore under no personal obligation to either of those officers. It is not because I feel under any obligation to them that I am here opposing this resolution; but it is an act of injustice to these gentlemen and their subordinate officers. They have their families to take care of. They had no reason to suppose that there would be any attempt to oust them from the positions they occupy, at the present session, and without homes provided for their families they are now to be dismissed, turned out of their positions without perhaps the means to accommodate their families for the next six or eight months. Heretofore they have always had notice. The election of Senators and a change of parties in the Senate have given notice to employés that there would be a change in the officers of the Senate. That has not been the case now, because I assert here, what has been asserted before, that there are not a half dozen Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and I am sure there is none on this side of the Chamber, who knew until within the last few days that the Senator from Virginia would cast his lot with the men on the other side of this Chamber whom he had been opposing through all his life. So I say there was no reason why any employé of the Senate should come to the conclusion that there was even a possibility of his being displaced and ousted from his position.

Mr. President, it is not alone the Secretary, it is not alone the Sergeant-at-Arms, it is not alone the Chaplain or the executive clerk whose displacement is involved in this proceeding, but the dismissal of all the employés of the Senate are involved in this resolution; their fate is dependent upon the adoption or rejection of this resolution and their future continuance in the employment of the Senate dependent thereon. If there was anything against any of these officers, if there was any just reason assigned why any of them should be removed, that would be a different thing. The Senator from Illinois yesterday with characteristic honesty proclaimed before the Senate that there was no charge that had been or could be preferred against the employés of the Senate or any of them. Why, then, do you propose to turn them out? In the first place take the Chaplain; why do you propose to turn out the Chaplain? Has he not faithfully prayed and implored the Divine benediction upon you for the last two years? Has he not invoked the forgiveness of your sins and besought the Almighty to guide you to all wisdom and all truth in your public and private ways; and is it not now an act of great ingratitude to the Chaplain of the Senate, who has been so fervent in his supplications in your behalf, that you should want to displace him from his position in this body?

Take your Secretary. Has he not been a courteous and obliging officer? Is there any man on either side of the Chamber who can say that he has not at all times been as courteous in his place as any gentleman who ever filled that position? Why, then, do you want to turn him out, or why any of these officers? Why the executive clerk?

I say here in the presence of the other side of the Chamber that they can assign no reason whatever except that these gentlemen do not vote the republican ticket. Why do you want to turn out these little boys—the pages who run with willing feet on this floor to do your bidding? As I look upon their bright faces I apprehend that they do not comprehend the fate that awaits them. As I see them going around this Hall, in these corridors, over these floors, with their sparkling eyes and smiling faces, I cannot believe they understand that this resolution is aimed in part at them.

> The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
> Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?

You propose to decapitate all these officers and employés; you intend to readjust them, and you have selected for that purpose a readjuster from Virginia.

But now, passing from this, there are other considerations that ought to operate upon the minds of the republican side of this Chamber. How have you got your majority? It is first by getting a vote that you did not expect, and which the country does not believe you have rightfully obtained, and secondly by the casting vote of the Vice-President in the organization of the Senate. This is an anomalous condition of affairs. Never in the history of the Senate has there been such a condition of affairs before. Even your present tenure of power you hold with an uncertain hand. You do not know how long you will hold it. So you ought to be cautious and consider with what circumspection you should move. You ought to feel the ground on which you stand before you erect your scaffold to hang all the officers of this body. A proper recognition of the uncertain tenure by which you hold power, a proper consideration of the position which you may soon occupy, ought to induce you to stay your hand and not attempt at this early stage after the possession of power in this body to do what is proposed in this resolution.

But there is a more serious consideration which ought to address itself to the other side of this Chamber. I do not say that there has been any bargain; I do not say that there has been any contract; I do not say that there has been any coalition; but I say to you, gentlemen, that the public judgment of this country, if we can judge from the papers, is to-day that there has been an improper agreement. I say to you that the papers of the country are full of accounts of combinations and of an unholy alliance. I say to you that if that alliance is consummated, if one exists, it will bring reproach and scandal upon this body of which you are members, and you ought not to do any act which in the public mind of this country will disgrace the Senate of the United States.

I do not say that there has been a coalition or a bargain of this kind, but I say that the rumor that there has been will be strengthened by the appointment of Mr. Riddleberger as Sergeant-at-Arms of this body, and his election will fasten the conviction upon the public mind of this country that either the republican party has for a consideration gone to Senator MAHONE or that Senator MAHONE has for a consideration gone to the republican party. I would avert from this Senate a calamity so dire. I desire not to see the body of which I have felt proud to be a member degraded by a suspicion in the public mind even if there may be no truth in the suspicion. While there may be nothing in this except mere suspicion, yet there is enough in it to put Senators on their guard lest by the consummation of the proposed scheme they bring reproach upon this high body where once sat a Jefferson as presiding officer, where once sat a Madison, where once sat a Clay, a Webster, a Clayton. However degenerate the present times, let us not as Senators here to-day bring reproach upon the fair fame of the Senate of the United States. I would caution you, my fellow-Senators, against the step proposed. So far as I am concerned, I will resist everything to the utmost of my power that tends to bring reproach and disgrace on this high body.

I have not said that you have entered into any coalition; I have not said that you have entered into any bargain; but I say that the public mind has taken hold of that idea; and are there not facts, is there not circumstantial evidence here that is calculated to carry such a conviction to the public mind? While I do not say you have made any bargain, I do not hesitate to declare that many a man charged with crime has been sent to the penitentiary and to the gallows upon circumstantial evidence less strong than that upon which the suspicions to which I have referred is predicated. I caution you, gentlemen, as members of the Senate of the United States, I tell you the press of this country will ring from one end of the land to the other with the charge that this resolution proposes the confirmation of a bargain which if made has brought disgrace upon the American Senate.

I have given you my views, and I ask and beseech you to pause lest you do that which in after years you may regret.

I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If the Senator from Texas were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) As already stated, I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I agreed to pair with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] but I have authority to transfer the pair. I shall transfer it to my colleague, [Mr. SAWYER,] who is absent at this time. I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) I have transferred my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] They are therefore paired on this vote.

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Brown,	Fair,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Call,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vest.

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt, of Conn.,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt, of N. Y.,
Conkling,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller,	Sherman.

ABSENT—28.

Anthony,	Garland,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Burnside,	George,	Mahone,	Teller,
Butler,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vance.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Saunders,	Walker,
Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there were a number of nominations sent to the Senate by the President of the United States yesterday and a number of others sent to-day, and in order that they may be referred to the appropriate committees, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called.) The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with my colleague, [Mr. SAWYER.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I once more announce that I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) I announce again that my colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] and the pair will last until the return of my colleague to the Senate, and I will not, therefore, announce it any more.

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. FARLEY, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I voted without noticing the absence of the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] I am paired with him, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LAMAR. I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bayard,	Coke,	Harris,	Ransom,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Fair,	Johnston,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vest.
Camden,	Grover,	Pendleton,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pugh,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins.
Conkling,	Hawley,	McMillan,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller,

ABSENT—32.

Anthony,	Garland,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Burnside,	George,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Butler,	Groome,	Maxey,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Vance.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,	Walker,
Ferry,	Lamar,	Sawyer,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. On which I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I announce my pair with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and I are paired on this question. He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. SAWYER'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAYARD, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I ask to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I voted under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote of the Senator from Delaware will be withdrawn.

Mr. VEST. I desire to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. COKE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] and my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I was requested to announce the pair of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] with his colleague, [Mr. SEWELL,] and also the pair of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Beck,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,
Call,	Fair,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Jonas,	Vest.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	McMillan,
Blair,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Miller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Conger,	Harrison,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Hawley,	McDill,	Rollins.

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	Garland,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Burnside,	George,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Butler,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Vance,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Walker,
Farley,	Lamar,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me that there are some motions which have precedence of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion pending to postpone the resolution until the first Monday of December next, but the motion to lay on the table has precedence, and is now before the Senate. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL,] or I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FAIR] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LAMAR, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] for the present.

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.] My colleague would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called,) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—9.

Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Hampton,	Jonas,	Saulsbury.
Coke,

NAYS—19.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Hoar,	Miller,

Edmunds,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Walker,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Williams.

Several SENATORS. No quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair was about to announce. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate adjourn ["no," "no"] for it is obvious that nothing can be done now. No business is in order except a call of the roll of the Senate for Senators who have voluntarily absented themselves, but a motion for an adjournment. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I regret that Senators should omit their duty to answer to their names——

Mr. HARRIS. A motion to adjourn is in order, and the Senator from Delaware has moved that the Senate do now adjourn. That is the only motion except one that it is in order to make, and it takes precedence of any other that can be made.

Mr. HOAR. I call the Senator from Tennessee to order.

Mr. HARRIS. I call the Senator from Massachusetts to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will suspend. The Chair will enforce the rules.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Delaware is in order and is not debatable. The question is on that motion.

The question being put, it was declared that by the sound the noes appeared to prevail.

Several Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] However, I reserved to myself the right to vote if my vote should be necessary to make a quorum. I will not vote at present.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.] If he were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PENDLETON. I was requested to announce the pair of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] for the rest of the evening.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Beck,	Coke,	Hampton,	Slater,
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Vest.
Call,	Gorman,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Grover,	Saulsbury,

Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Davis of Ill.,	Jackson,	Platt of N. Y.,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Jonas,	Plumb,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. FARLEY. It has become perfectly apparent that our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber do not propose to transact the business for which we have been called together, and more apparent that the gentleman who first announced on that side that this was a question of endurance has been one of the first Senators to flee from the Senate—I allude to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON]—and he has taken with him another distinguished gentleman, the Senator from Virginia, I suppose. Neither of them is in his place. This question of endurance so far as the Senator from Pennsylvania is concerned has been put upon the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] Other gentlemen who have been leading this fight on the opposite side of the Chamber have gone off for their comfort and their pleasure. Now I say, if it is a question of endurance, I want it understood that we propose to endure on this side as long as this Senate shall remain in session.

Mr. LOGAN. Why don't you endure?

Mr. FARLEY. We are enduring.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of a quorum the only business in order is a call of the roll or a motion to adjourn. Debate can be permitted only by unanimous consent.

Mr. VEST. I move to adjourn, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. What was the last vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas were 14 and the nays were 19.

Mr. HOAR. What was the question voted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Delaware was that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Is a new motion to adjourn now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] made that motion. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] now moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. My inquiry of the Chair is whether that motion is in order as a motion to adjourn has just been negatived?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There has been a speech since then.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] has been heard upon the pending question since that vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts raise the point of order that the motion cannot now be entertained?

Mr. HOAR. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit that question to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I will not raise it if the Chair will not decide it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate do now adjourn. Were the yeas and nays demanded? ["No!" "No!"] The Chair will put the question.

The question being put, it was declared that by the sound the "ayes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. ROLLINS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] It is due to that Senator to say that this pair was made some time ago.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to announce that I am paired with the express understanding that in case of a necessity to make a quorum I can vote. I vote "nay."

Several SENATORS. A quorum has voted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I recall my vote. I understand that there is a quorum present without my vote. If so, I desire to recall my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is not recorded.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Coke,	Harris,	Pugh.
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Johnston,	Slater,
Camden,	Grover,	Jonas,	Vest.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Morrill,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sawyer.

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Butler,	Garland,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Mahone,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vance,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Walker,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 11, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Bayard,	Call,	Grover,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Coke,	Hampton,	Saulsbury.
Brown,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Morrill,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sawyer.

ABSENT—45.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sherman,
Burnside,	Garland,	Lamar,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	McPherson,	Teller,
Camden,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DAWES. Let the roll be called, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. That motion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands a motion to adjourn to be always in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Did we not just now vote down a motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; a motion to go into executive session. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 20.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us have the yeas and nays. Senators voted on the other side, and some on this side did not vote.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not vote because I am paired.

Mr. LOGAN. I know.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the mistake arose in this way: I rose not remembering at the time that I was paired, and immediately sat down. I presume the Clerk caught sight of me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would change the result, making the ayes 20 and the noes 20. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon?

Mr. HARRIS. I insist on the call, because I do not know whether the Clerk counted the Senator from South Carolina or not.

Mr. McMILLAN and Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I have transferred the pair that I made with the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] to the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] who is unwell and is going away. Therefore I vote "yea," the Senator from Oregon not voting.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FAIR] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I voted "nay" under the impression that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] was present in his seat. I see he is not here, and therefore I withdraw my vote. I am paired with him.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bayard,	Camden,	Gorman,	Johnston,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,
Call,	Farley,	Jackson,	Saulsbury.

NAYS—19.

Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Morrill,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sawyer.
Frye,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—41.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Davis of W. Va.,	Garland,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Edmunds,	George,
Burnside,	Conkling,	Fair,	Groome,
Butler,	Davis of Illinois,	Ferry,	Grover,
Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Saunders,	Vest,
Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Sewell,	Voorhees,
Jonas,	Maxey,	Sherman,	Walker,
Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Slater,	Williams.
Jones of Nevada,	Platt of N. Y.,	Teller,
Kellogg,	Plumb,	Vance,
Lamar,	Ransom,	Van Wyck,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn; but a quorum has not voted.

Mr. DAWES. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Jackson,	Platt of Conn.,
Beck,	Edgerton,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Blair,	Farley,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Brown,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Burnside,	Gorman,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Butler,	Groome,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Call,	Hale,	McDill,	Slater,
Camden,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Miller,	Voorhees.
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Mitchell,
Coke,	Hawley,	Morgan,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call shows the presence of forty-nine Senators—more than a quorum. The question recurs upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, submitted by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GROVER] is paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] I transferred the pair which I had with the Senator from New York to the Senator from Oregon, and I vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) As heretofore announced, I am paired upon all these questions with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] I am paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Coke,	Jackson,	Slater,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Vest.
Call,	Gorman,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Hampton,	Pugh,

NAYS—19.

Blair,	Hale,	Logan,	Morrill,
Conger,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sawyer.
Frye,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Butler,	George,	McPherson,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Mahone,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt of N. Y.,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Plumb,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit one or two remarks, which I know are not in order if any one objects.

Mr. LOGAN and others. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Delaware proceeding to debate? ["No objection!"] The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. My object is simply to contribute to the practical and orderly conduct of the business of this body. I have none other than a public purpose in coming here, and I have had none at any time other than a public purpose in addressing the Senate. Three times, or more than three times, within the last half hour it has been disclosed to the Senate that there is not a quorum present who can vote. Why is it that when 49 names are recorded upon the roll call, a quorum of 39 cannot be found upon any vote? It is because upon the solicitation of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber a number of Senators have agreed to pair with them. I do not say that it is so in the case of every pair, but I do say it is within the personal knowledge of Senators as well as it is within my knowledge that enough are absent upon the request and for the convenience and in response to the sense of comity, originating with the other side, to break a quorum of the Senate.

Therefore it is that I submit to our brethren on the other side that it would be well to let the ordinary adjournment take place. We have been here since twelve o'clock; it is now past six. I do not know how it may be with others, but my fast has not been broken for more than nine hours. I know very well from practical experience that it is not precisely the condition in which men should attend to grave public business. The tempers of men are not improved by it; the tone of debate is not elevated by it; there is no good to be gained by it. That has been proved over and over again.

I desire of all things to treat worthily the questions which I approach in this body. I would not have the proceeding on a question of this kind, upon which I take it for granted there is conscience on both sides, degenerate into a mere wrangle. I will not use the term "physical endurance;" it is not the question for this body. We are not here to decide questions upon physical endurance; we are here to decide them according to reason, and courtesy, and law. Therefore I say, having spent the day in the attempt to settle this question, let us adjourn this settlement until to-morrow. If it may not be reached then, let the usual adjournment still take place.

We had nearly three weeks of disagreement as to the organization of the committees of the Senate. There was no such attempt made as to punish men physically for a disagreement in opinion. Why should it be made now and continued upon this question?

I submit, with all respect, to those who lead this debate upon the other side, and to my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES,] that it would be well and proper for us now at the hour at which we stand, and in view of the fact that one-third of our associates have deliberately absented themselves from our council, that we should adjourn. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to make that motion.

Mr. DAWES. It does not become us, of course, to impugn any Senator's motives in the course which each Senator deems it his duty to pursue here. I assume that all of my associates here are actuated by what they conceive to be a common duty. We have been here all day since twelve o'clock, differing very essentially as to what our duty is. A majority, a constitutional majority, of this body are of opinion that we should proceed to the election of officers. There are enough in the constitutional minority to have kept up the struggle until this time. At this time there is disclosed a want of a quorum. In my own experience in Congress I have never seen anything practical accomplished by an attempt to force the attendance of members of the other House or of this. I do not think that if we should attempt to enforce the attendance of members here to-night, it would result in anything practical. If our fellow-Senators do not feel moved by a sense of duty sufficient to keep them in their places and in the discharge of their duty until a majority of the Senate shall be here, but leave those who feel otherwise to stay here and find themselves without a quorum, that is for them to answer.

I am willing to stay here and discharge this duty, and meet it at the end when the end shall come, answering to those who have a right to call me to an account for the manner in which I do it; but if of those who act with me and those who act upon the other side, enough of them feel otherwise, so that they leave us who feel it our duty to stay here without a quorum, they must take the responsibility. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 26, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to submit an amendment which I intend to offer to the resolution submitted by my colleague [Mr. INGALLS] yesterday in relation to appointments in the War Department, which I ask may lie on the table, to be called up when the resolution is brought before the Senate. Let it be read now for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add to the resolution:

Eleventh. From what States, Territories, or districts, respectively, said clerks and other employés were appointed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order, and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts for the election of certain officers of the Senate. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT put the question on the motion and declared that he was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I desire to state for the day that I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who if here would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea." I make this statement for the entire day.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his names was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I announce this pair for the day.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question and on all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FARLEY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Fair,	Jonas,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Hale,	McDill,	Rollins,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Teller,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Frye,	Logan,	Plumb,

ABSENT—18.

Anthony,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Butler,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Conkling,	Groome,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the vote will now be taken on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the pending resolution lie on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the motion to be to postpone.

Mr. FERRY. What is the motion?

Mr. DAWES. Let the Chair state the motion again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is that the pending resolution lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. I thought it was to postpone until December.

Mr. HOAR. He made this pending the other motion.

Mr. HARRIS. The motion to postpone will be in order when this motion is disposed of, but the Chair states the motion correctly. It is to lay the resolution on the table, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to lay the resolution on the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay." I make this announcement for all votes of this character that may be taken this morning.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] on all questions connected with this matter. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As I before stated, I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BECK, (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called.) My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent from the city because of sickness, and his pair continues with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I announce the pair for the day.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Camden,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Hale,	McDill,	Rollins,
Blair,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Teller,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Frye,	Logan,	Plumb,

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,
Butler,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Vance,
Conkling,	Garland,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Ransom,

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move the indefinite postponement of the resolution, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is recorded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He is recorded.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	Fair,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Pugh,

NAYS—30.

Allison,	Frye,	Logan,	Plumb,
Blair,	Hale,	McDill,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Teller,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—16.

Anthony,	Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,
Butler,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vance,
Edmunds,	Groome,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] to indefinitely postpone the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a statement that by way of interrogatory has been made by several Senators on the other side of the Chamber, first by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] and next by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and again by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] that the proposition to go into this election is without precedent, and that at no time in the history of this country had the election of officers of the Senate ever taken place at an executive session called like this. I believe that was the statement.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With one exception.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, so that the declaration shall not go to the country unchallenged, to read the proceedings of the Senate at an executive session, called, as this is, March 16, 1853:

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Adams, the 14th instant, respecting the election of the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate; and, having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will, to-morrow at one o'clock, elect a Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Assistant Doorkeeper.

That was agreed to on the 16th day of March, 1853, and the election proceeded in accordance with that resolution at that executive session. Then on March 17, 1853:

The Senate proceeded to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, pursuant to the resolution of the 16th instant; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that Dunning R. McNair was duly elected.

Mr. McNair attended; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the President pro tempore.

The Senate proceeded to the election of an Assistant Doorkeeper, pursuant to the resolution of the 16th instant; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that Isaac Holland was duly elected.

Mr. Holland attended; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the President pro tempore.

I merely call the attention of the Senate to this record to show that precisely the same proceeding we are now attempting was enacted in the Senate on the 16th day of March, 1853, under a resolution offered by Mr. Adams, of Mississippi, on the 14th of that month. The election took place under a resolution similar to the one that we have offered; the officers were sworn in; they took their places, performed their duties; and afterward a resolution was offered in the Senate, which I shall not read but merely state, giving to the outgoing officers of the Senate certain pay or extending their salary so as to cover a certain term. That was exactly the proceeding in 1853, and, as far as I have read, it is precisely in accord with that which we propose to do now.

Mr. BUTLER. Apropos of that, I ask the Clerk to read part of the debate which took place in this Chamber March 24, 1879. I believe our republican friends on that occasion expressed their opinion on the subject of a change of the officers of the Senate, and I am inclined to suppose they will remain of the opinion which was then expressed by some of the leading republican Senators on the other side of the Chamber. In view of giving them the benefit of what was then said, I ask the Clerk to read from page 47 of the RECORD of the Forty-sixth Congress, first session, the debate of March 24, 1879.

Mr. BROWN. Before the reading——

Mr. BUTLER. I will further state that as I understand the debate on this side of the Chamber it was conceded on all sides that there was one precedent, and but one precedent.

Mr. BROWN. That is the remark I was going to make. If the Senator from Illinois will refer to the RECORD he will find that I stated there had been one exception to this rule. Then my honorable friend from Florida I think interposed and said that there was but one of the officers elected as he recollected at that session. The Senator will see by reference to the RECORD that I made the exception.

Mr. LOGAN. That is immaterial. I am not going into a discussion as to what was said on either side. The question was asked me by the Senator from Florida if there was any precedent for this proceeding. I said—I remember it perfectly well—that I had not examined to see whether there was or not. That is what I said at the time, because I had not then made the examination; but for the purpose of answering the Senator's question I examined the records, and I found the precedent that I have read.

Mr. HARRIS. It has been stated more than once I am sure upon this side of the Chamber that there was one single exception, and but one, to the general rule, and that was in 1853. Upon a somewhat careful examination I have found no other. I have found that one, and it has been stated, as I have before said, more than once on this side of the Chamber pending this debate.

Mr. LOGAN. That one is enough.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator from Illinois to give his attention to that occasion. It was a resolution by which every officer of the Senate but one was simply declared re-elected, and that one it was declared was removed for cause and a successor appointed; but the officer going out upon that occasion, though removed for cause, I believe was voted a year's salary, the salary to continue for a year after, certainly for some considerable time after he was so discharged for cause. If the Senator from Illinois has found another precedent where at an executive session the officers of the Senate have been elected, he has been more fortunate in his researches than I have been, and more fortunate than I think any one else has been or will be; because I think it is the only time when such a thing was undertaken from the beginning of the Government up to 1853; and never from 1853 up to this occasion has such a thing been attempted in the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say in response to the Senator from Tennessee that it is no matter whether there be many or few precedents, there is certainly one; nor does it make any difference whether the Senate elected the same officers or other officers. The question is, have we a right to elect, not whom we choose to elect.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] yield the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. I do, for the present.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think any one on this side of the Chamber questions the constitutional power of the Senate to elect its own officers at this time. I certainly do not. Whenever the Senate is in session I hold it to be within the constitutional power of the Senate to perform any act that the Senate may perform without the concurrence of the House of Representatives. I do not question the constitutional power.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what I have contended for all the time. If that is the right of the Senate, then the minority is obstructing the authority of the majority of the Senate; and that is the point precisely that I make.

One word more and I am done. It is not a good argument to say that this should not be done because there are not many precedents for it. The Senator very well knows the history of the Senate. Up to 1853 the politics of the Senate had been one way for a great while. A change then took place, and an election of officers was had. The Senate then remained in that condition up to 1861. An election took place then, not at an executive session but at a regular session. Some officers were changed and others put in their places, and some were retained. The Senate remained from that time up to two years ago with the same political majority that it had at that time. Hence no election occurred. These elections only occur when the political status of the Senate changes, and whenever it does change the power then is in the majority to either retain the same officers or elect new officers. The right to elect the officers of the Senate is a constitutional right given to the majority which no one has a right to gainsay.

I merely read this precedent to answer the interrogatory that had been put to me by the Senator from Florida, in order that I might place before the country a precedent justifying our own action in the premises at least.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further?

Mr. FARLEY. For one moment.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. As the Senator from Illinois seems to be apt in hunting up precedents, I ask him if he can find a precedent where the dominant party have continuously refused to go into executive session for the purpose of considering appointments made by a President of their own party, as the party on the other side of the Chamber has refused on this occasion? Further, sir, you cannot find a precedent, in my judgment, where a party has refused to go into an executive session of the Senate simply for the purpose of avoiding action upon nominations, and that solely for the purpose of considering questions that might be brought up in the discharge of the duties of the Senate in executive session, so far as appointments are concerned.

Here we have treaties that are lying on the table of the Secretary. They have been there for weeks, and it is necessary that they should be considered. I find our republican friends on the opposite side of the Chamber refusing to go into an executive session for an hour or for a minute. After we come out of executive session you can renew your fight here on this question. If you show me a precedent where the party in power, or a party claiming to be the party in power, has refused to go into executive session for the purposes which I have mentioned, I should like to see it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that, inasmuch as his time is not wholly employed, I suppose it would be very interesting to him to perform that duty himself, and not ask it of others.

Mr. FARLEY. I certainly am not engaged in hunting up precedents on this question.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not engaged in hunting up precedents for the Senator in order to aid him in his argument; but in reply, to give him a kind of Yankee answer, as it is termed in our part of the country, will he be kind enough in the time that is allotted to him in which he has nothing else to do to hunt up some precedent and place it before the Senate where the minority of the Senate has ever endeavored to rule the majority in their right to elect the officers of the Senate?

Mr. FARLEY. Allow me to say to my dear friend from Illinois that the minority of the Senate for two weeks filibustered against the majority in reference to the organization of the committees. Before the adjournment of the last Congress for two or three days and one whole night the other side of the Chamber filibustered against going into executive session, and refused to vote sitting in their seats. My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] shakes his head. I remember distinctly that he on the last night of the Forty-sixth Congress refused to vote, and other Senators on that side did the same thing, and we were in session here during the entire night.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator indulge me for one moment?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly, sir, with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. I will occupy that moment in expressing the hope that when the Senator comes to look up the precedents he will be less inaccurate about the former ones than he is about those so recent. He evidently knows nothing about them.

Mr. FARLEY. If I should be as accurate about the former ones as about the one I have just stated, I would be entirely accurate in all that I might state. But I say I am not hunting up precedents on this question. I simply say that there are no precedents where the party in power or those claiming to be the party in power have refused as persistently as has the republican side of the Chamber to go into executive session in order to consider the business which we have been called here to transact.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator from South Carolina entitled to the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. I am; but I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I was merely anxious to call the attention of the Senate to the business before it, for I am very desirous of proceeding with the business of the session for which we were called. I know it would be an interesting discussion of the constitutional power of the Senate to elect its own officers, adopt its own rules, choose its presiding officer, do anything that is absolutely necessary to make it a Senate, so that it could do executive business, if it would so chance that the House was not in session at the other end of the Capitol. I know that would be a very interesting question, and I think that it would be very much to our profit if we could find that somebody had discovered before now that it was a question. The search for precedents seems to be in the British Parliament the way to settle every question which arises. There is a committee appointed to search for precedents, and if it can be found that a thing has ever been done before, that settles the question whether it ought to be done now. That might be a proper pursuit of this Senate, if we were not pressed with the public business for which we were called here; but inasmuch as it is absolutely necessary in order to proceed with the public business that the Senate should be organized, and should be organized as its majority and not its minority shall determine, I think it would be in the interest of the public business that we should vote directly upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee; and if the majority of the Senate shall determine that they will postpone indefinitely or till next December this resolution, that ought to settle it in everybody's mind. If on the other hand the majority shall determine otherwise, we all ought to acquiesce and proceed as the majority shall determine. That is the theory upon which the Government rests, and any departure from it is a departure from the very fundamental principles upon which the whole structure of this Government is founded, and I know there can be no considerable number of Senators who desire to overthrow the Government by any departure——

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator one moment to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the Senate is not organized for business, and if there is any complaint against any single officer in the employment of this Senate?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will only let us vote on this resolution, he will have an answer that neither he nor myself can go behind.

Mr. BUTLER. I think if the Senator will only withdraw his resolution and let us proceed with the business for which we were assembled, it will be a great deal better for all parties.

Mr. DAWES. I have asked the question of the Senate, and presented it in the form of a resolution to the Senate, whether the Senate is now organized and officered in accordance with the will of the majority. I shall abide by that vote without question, and I know the Senator from South Carolina is just as willing as I am to abide by it. The Senator from South Carolina never resists the results of a majority where the verdict, the decree of the majority is honestly expressed, and I know he will not now.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the honorable Senator what occasion there is for the exercise of the will of the majority in this particular direction just at this particular time? I should like to ask that question.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know who can answer that question as well as the majority of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts represents the majority; he represents the caucus of the republican party, and I therefore take it he can answer as well as every Senator can answer for himself.

Mr. DAWES. With all due respect to the Senator from South Carolina, I do not feel like setting up my own private judgment against the will of the majority constitutionally expressed.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the Secretary proceed to read what I have marked in the record of the proceedings of March 24, 1879, with a view of enlightening the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator had better reduce his resolution to writing. If it covers so many we cannot know how many we are to vote upon.

Mr. WALLACE. It is simply a motion to proceed to the election of these officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the election of these officers the Chair hears no objection.

[A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as we have just received a communication from the President of the United States, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that message; and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I announce now for the last time that I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] It is not necessary to detain the Senate by continuing to make that announcement.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I announce that I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] on all questions connected with this resolution. I make the announcement now so that I need not continue to make it hereafter during the various calls in the afternoon.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Call,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Walker.

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado.	Mahone,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Miller,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Butler,	Garland,	Morgan.	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vance,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Vest,
Farley,	Kellogg,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to take part in this debate; but I desire to show the Senator from South Carolina that there is very good reading in the volume which he has had in part read at the Clerk's desk, and I do this with the more gratification because the Nestor of the democratic party here, the Senator from Delaware, yesterday came at us with philosophy and with poetry and politics, and with a very solemn intoned voice charged that the country would ring with what we were doing here on the present occasion. At least he made the Senate ring with what he gave utterance to yesterday. I now desire to call his attention and that of the Senate to the remarks made two years ago by that Senator, and I will ask——

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I of course do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Vermont, but I was proceeding to deliver my speech, which I have not completed.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from South Carolina lost the floor upon the taking of the vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I am aware of that; but I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to permit me to complete what remarks I was making by having the record read to the point where I desired to stop.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall occupy but a short time, and if the Senator will allow me to finish now, I should prefer to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly, if the Senator is entitled to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont declines to yield.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] spoke as follows two years ago, March 21, 1879:

I should be very glad to see our brethren on the other side take their present situation a little more cheerfully. I could congratulate them, from the experience of a number of years in the minority, on the fact that it is a much pleasanter position than I apprehend they found as members of the majority. They can aid in giving proper information at the proper time and in a proper way; but on this side of the House when we strike a line on our own action it is a duty to ourselves not to permit the other side of the House to shape our course of policy in reference to any particular measure. It had better be understood at once that the democratic party in possession have responsibilities now upon them, and intend to pursue their own line of policy, uncontrolled and uninfluenced by what may be the wishes of the other side in reference to questions especially of a political character. I hope our friends on the other side will reconcile themselves to their present position, and like Christian statesmen bear it manfully. [Laughter.]—Congressional Record, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 40.

Again, the Nestor of the democratic party was heard from later. He said, on April 18, 1879:

I think we are fully competent to manage the affairs of the Senate and retain such officers as in our judgment it is proper to retain and to remove such as in the opinion of those who are charged with the management of the public business in this Chamber should be removed.

I have nothing to say against the employés of the Senate, those that have been placed in power by our republican friends.

And again:

I desire to say for one that I have no disposition to see a slaughter of the innocents; but at the same time as a democrat I should be untrue to my own feelings, I believe I should be untrue to the party that placed me as a Senator on this floor, if I should prefer my enemies to my friends. I do not do it, and I think there are places within the employment of this Senate that should be given to our democratic friends, and for one I shall advocate that policy, notwithstanding it meets with reprehension from gentlemen on the other side.—Congressional Record, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 539.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Vermont has done me a favor in reading my remarks on that occasion; but I desire to remind him that that was at a regular session. There was not any attempt on the part of the democrats of the Senate to go into an election of officers at an executive session; and it became necessary from the restlessness displayed on the other side that they should have some proper advice given to them, and I volunteered, perhaps a little officiously, to give to my friends on the other side some advice which I think was practically beneficial to them and improved their political morality in a very considerable degree. I have nothing to take back of anything I said then. If the Senator had read this at a regular session, when it would have been proper to go into an election of officers, it perhaps might have been more appropriate than it is on the present occasion.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. President, as we have heard from the Nestor on the democratic side, I propose that we shall hear from the Nestor on the republican side; and inasmuch as "the constitutional majority of the Senate," consisting of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] and Mr. Riddleberger, decline to go into consideration of executive business, I ask that the Nestor of the Senate on the republican side be heard as he spoke in debate in 1879. I refer to the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I ask the Clerk to resume the reading where he left off.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Chair will put the question. I do not know of any reason for proceeding to the election.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the election of the officers named.

Mr. WALLACE. Let the Secretary read the names of the officers.

The SECRETARY. Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I am too well aware that nothing which I can say, nothing which any one may say, will arrest or modify the foregone determination to make a sweeping change of the officers and servants of the Senate; a change demanded, not by any deficiencies or neglect of duty on their part, but by the inexorable necessities of political partisanship. Yet, as one who has served long in this body, who has paid some attention to its rules, and who has a profound respect, nay a reverence, for its precedents and its traditions, I am unwilling to see the measure initiated without recording my protest and uttering my unavailing warning to the majority against the personal discomfort and inconvenience to which they are subjecting themselves and their associates, and the danger to which they are exposing the orderly and decorous transaction of the business of the Senate.

The Senate, except the judiciary, is the most conservative part of the Government. Unlike the House of Representatives, which expires every two years, and is renewed fresh from the people, the Senate never dies. The same which it was, when it met, in 1789, it is now, and has held continuous and unbroken existence ever since. Its offices have naturally partaken of its permanent character. Its elective officers are chosen, not for a definite period, but during the pleasure of the Senate, and its subordinate officers have not been, habitually, removed without cause, nor for many years, without the approval of the Vice-President. This policy has secured to us a corps of trained, experienced, respectful, and efficient servants, who knew that their tenure of office was in their good behavior, not in their political opinions. Since its organization, the Senate has had but six secretaries: the first was Samuel Allyn Otis, who was elected in 1789 and served till his death in 1814, a period of twenty-five years; the second was Charles Cutts, who was elected in 1814 and served till 1825, a period of eleven years; Walter Lowery was elected in 1825 and served till 1836, a like period of eleven years, when he resigned, and Asbury Dickins was elected, who served till 1861, a period of twenty-five years; the infirmities of age had come to interfere with his attendance upon the Senate and to incapacitate him for the performance of his duties. A republican Senate elected the Chief Clerk, William Hickey, a democrat, acting secretary, continuing Mr. Dickins as Secretary. But the arrangement did not work well. The two did not get on together. Mr. Dickins was unwilling to remit to Mr. Hickey the duties which he could not perform himself. At his suggestion the Senate proceeded to the election of his successor, and provided for the salary of Mr. Dickins for a year, in the course of which he died.

The office required vigorous manhood and the full possession of the physical as well as the intellectual powers that pertain to that condition. John W. Forney was elected in 1861 and served till 1868, when he resigned. Mr. Hickey was continued in the office of chief clerk till 1866, when he died. In 1868 the present efficient and accomplished Secretary was elected, and who is about to be displaced for no complaint or allegation of wrong on his part. How important and dignified the office was regarded is attested by the fact that the first Secretary had been a delegate to the Continental Congress, and his two immediate successors had been members of this body. The others rose to the position through a series of important positions, that manifested the public confidence and the respect of their fellow-citizens.

When I first entered this Chamber the door of the main entrance was opened for me by the venerable man who sits at it now; who had then been here for a period as long as I have remained since, covering a time of forty years. I found in charge of the document-room Moses Titcomb, who had come down from the days of Webster and Clay and Calhoun and Benton, and was esteemed by them all, and was frequently consulted by them on matters of his department. He was a most accomplished man for his position; he seemed to have in his head a catalogue raisonné of all the documents that had been printed from the beginning of the Government. If you wanted an old bill or a forgotten report, belonging to one of the early Congresses, you had but to write the subject, or a hint of the subject, on a card, send it up to him by a page, and the document came down to you. He remained in office till increasing years caused his resignation, and was succeeded by a man who had been trained under his eye, and who partakes largely of his varied and accurate information upon the subjects under his charge. He is still in office; but the hands of the clock are hurrying to his doom.

At that desk sat William J. McDonald who had been, twenty-three years previously, appointed a clerk, on the resignation of his father, a few days before his death, after twenty-seven years' service. Mr. McDonald had then been in service twenty-three years, and remained nineteen years longer, till his death, having risen to the position of chief clerk that was occupied by his father. His son is now in office here. At his death the Senate honored his memory by taking a recess to attend his funeral; his pall was borne by Senators, and his funeral expenses were paid out of the contingent fund. I found here my friend, Mr. Bassett, who sits on your left, whose hairs have whitened in the service of the Senate, and who has sat there so long that he seems almost a part of the Chamber. He entered the Senate nigh fifty years ago as a page, and has risen step by step through his own merit to the second place in its executive administration. I trust that I violate no confidence when I say that he has recorded the memoirs of his long connection with this body, and that he proposes to give them to the public. They will not fail to form an interesting chapter of American personal history.

I might adduce other examples, but I forbear. Of the hundred and twenty officers of the Senate, I judge that full thirty are democrats, some of whom we found in office, when we came into possession, in 1861, and others have since been selected, through the liberality of the appointing power. Such has been the practice of the Senate. I regret the new departure. I think that it is regretted, on personal grounds, and by a regard for the traditions of the Senate, by many of those who are about to make it, particularly the older Senators, and who are impelled to it by a force which few men have the strength to resist. We on this side of the Chamber have no power to prevent it. We share in the inconvenience, but we have no part in the responsibility.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think my friend from Rhode Island did not state so distinctly as he might have done, and perhaps ought to have done, one fact in connection with the persons who have held the various offices in this body to which he has referred. He did in gross refer to the number of political opponents of what had been the majority of this body who were allowed to retain places here; but it will be recollected by all who are cognizant of the facts that Mr. Dickins held the office of Secretary through the varied administrations of three distinct parties. He was elected by the democratic party by a very close vote. Subsequent to that period of time the old whig party had control of this body, and they sought not to disturb him. Following them came the republican party, and we sought not to disturb him. He was not removed in the true sense of the word. An election of Mr. Forney was had at Mr. Dickins's own suggestion, and this body provided for an additional year's salary for him before that election took place, and before that year had expired Mr. Dickins deceased. Mr. Hickey, another pronounced democrat, had served here through, I think, the administration of three distinct parties; and the worthy, the accomplished, and I add the beloved officer who sits at your left (Mr. Bassett) has, I think, held through as many. And Mr. McDonald was found here; he was retained and promoted up to the office of Chief Clerk regularly from the position which he held.

Such has been the administration of this body politically. Individually I care very little about the matter; but as a Senator I do say that I regret to see this sweeping removal of the best officers we have and the putting in their places of men who, if equally qualified, will require a long and varied experience before they can discharge their duties equally well. I had hoped the mad spirit of partisanship would not thus run riot in this body, but that the counsels and the practices and the precedents of this body might in a small degree have been observed. It is not to be so, however, and I can only say again that I regret it exceedingly.—Congressional Record, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, pages 47 and 48.

Mr. BUTLER. There are expressions of the opinion of two of the Nestors of the Senate, one of whom, [Mr. HAMLIN,] I regret to say, is no longer a member of the body. Now, I should like to have the view of another Nestor read for the information of our friends on the other side.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have heard nobody present the proposition which the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania answers. I have heard nobody suggest that, if either or all of these places were vacant, it would be improper for the majority of the Senate to fill that place or those places with a person or with persons of their own political persuasion. The Senator from Pennsylvania rises to vindicate the propriety of such action. If the case were here, it would need no vindication. Nobody I think would urge, if the Secretaryship of the Senate were vacant and a proper man could be found, as doubtless he could, in the democratic party, that the democrats ought not to vote for him rather than for some other man of different political standing.

The suggestion made so forcibly by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] as I understand it, is wholly different. This is the position: For the first time in the history of the American Senate, for the first time in the history of political parties in this country, a party majority insists upon vacating by removal, without cause, all the chief places of the Senate, to the end that they may put in favorites of their own. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] has said not one word to justify or excuse that. The history of the Senate is against it. The experience of all those who have gone before us disapproves it. The usage and custom of the body has affirmed that these places ought not to be put up in a political raffle and ought not to be made the rewards or the penalties of political service. The unvarying judgment of the past declares that those who hold these places should stand and be allowed to remain on their merits. That all this is to be reversed, is the more noticeable now, because we have heard, the whole country has heard, so much of late about political appointments. Reform in this respect has been thought by organs of democratic sentiment of transcendent urgency. A doctrine of vast wholesomeness and importance has been proclaimed which forbids to-day's doings. Public officers in general, not only these but others, should be allowed to continue, should be encouraged to remain, should be protected in position so long as their personal character remains untarnished and they discharge their duties. This is the substance and nearly the form of the doctrines which the exponents of democratic sentiment have been noisy in adopting and proclaiming. This is the doctrine which has needed only to be preached, whether practiced or not, to earn the applause of all the assailants and traducers of the political party to which I belong.

Now, in the very midst of this awakening, in the very midst of this quickening of the public conscience, here comes for the first time into the Senate a pioneer exaction, one outrunning every exaction of past times and of past party appetite; it is that a besom of destruction shall pass over all the officers of the Senate, or if I may credit the newspaper over all but one—preserved, I suppose, to fulfill the saying that there are exceptions to all rules—that all but one shall be swept away without cause, in the presence of the notorious fact that they are faithful, that they are accomplished, that they are sedulous in the discharge of their duties, and without pretense that their personal character is tarnished. They are all to give way in order that the positions here in this last sanctuary, the positions which, whatever may have been the changes of party control elsewhere, have stood, as the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Rhode Island have told us, against the exactions and behest of partisan cupidity, that they too shall at last be subjected to the voracity of those who in political strife have entitled themselves to spoil and booty.

Mr. President, I will content myself with saying in the language of the Senator from Maine that, although a partisan, not shrinking from the logic of partisan action, I too regret that the interest, the business, the convenience of the Senate is to be impaired, as it must be, no matter how meritorious the new-comers, by displacing those trained by long experience and faithfulness in their places, to the end that room may be made for those who, whatever may be their deserts in the arena of politics, are entirely uneducated in the duties which await them.—Congressional Record, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 48.

Mr. BUTLER. Now on page 538 of the same RECORD there is another expression of opinion from the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] which I wish read. It was on April 18, 1879.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It was necessary that the elective officers of the Senate should be in sympathy with the party which sustained the Union and the Constitution. The elective officers have access to our executive and to our secret legislative sessions; they are familiar with all our proceedings; they are necessarily the depositaries of our secrets, and they know, to some extent, the foreshadowed action of the body. It was not deemed prudent that any man whose fidelity to the Union and Constitution was not above suspicion or equivocation should be admitted into the secret sessions of the Senate, and for that reason the change was made.

The venerable Secretary of the Senate, who was a democrat and had been for more than twenty years in office, was retained, retained until he became incapacitated, by sickness and old age, from performing the duties of his office. Mr. McDonald, who had been in the service of the Senate twenty-two years, was a democrat, and was retained and promoted. Mr. Bassett, who had been here more than twenty years, was retained and promoted; and of the subordinate employés there were very few removals made. There were many vacancies; because many of the officers followed their patrons, who abandoned their seats and went into the South carrying their sympathies, if not their swords, to the aid of the rebellion, and their places of course were filled by men of our own political persuasion.

I have a list somewhere of the number of officers that were retained; it is very large, and they were retained for a long time, and very few changes were made. None, probably, would have been made from political considerations. They were made from loyal considerations.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senate should become republican in 1881, two years from now, will he oppose a change of the officers then?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will answer that when the time comes; and I hope to see it. I cannot tell whether another rebellion may not break out in the South. There seem to be signs of it now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If a rebellion does not break out, how then? Will you move to change them or not? Suppose we do not rebel?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will depend upon the manner in which they fulfill the duties of their offices. I do not think I shall ever be found advocating the removal of officers of this body who have performed their duties with fidelity, with honesty, and with intelligence.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that our friends on the other side of the Chamber cannot possibly resist such appeals made by their own friends, the Nestors of the Senate at that time; and to enable them to have time to read the remarks of these distinguished Senators in the RECORD to-morrow, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] and hence cannot vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] whom I do not see in his seat.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when Mr. VEST'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I inquire whether the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote of the Senator from Alabama is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. TELLER. Then I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Slater,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—28.

Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Plumb,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Sewell,
Farley,	Kellogg,	Sherman,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON, (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) It is very apparent that we are to do no business to-day, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn, and ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. VOORHEES, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I therefore withdraw my vote, as I had forgotten the pair when my name was called.

Mr. PLUMB. I was paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] until half after one. That time has elapsed, but the Senator has not returned, and I will extend the pair to this vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Beck,	Fair,	Jonas,	Ransom,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks on the subject of the pending resolution.

The Constitution, article 1, section 3, says, "The Senate shall choose their other officers."

Section 5, article 1, "A majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business."

This, therefore, beyond reasonable question declares that the Senate, a majority being a quorum, shall choose their other officers.

If these were all the provisions of the Constitution relating to this subject it would not follow that the extreme propositions of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] would be true, but that the more moderate conclusion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would be true, namely, that under the Constitution a majority of the Senate being present, they would have the right to choose their other officers; and this constitutional right would of necessity demand a constitutional submission to its exercise. But these are not all of the constitutional provisions relating to this subject. Paragraph 2, section 5, article 1, provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

The Constitution, therefore, declares in these three provisions that the Senate shall choose their other officers, a majority being a quorum to do business, subject to the rules which the Senate has determined for its proceedings.

Whatever is required or authorized or permitted under these rules it is manifest is of constitutional authority and obligation, and cannot be, either in form or substance, treason, unless, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] insists, obedience to the Constitution has become treason.

The Senators from Massachusetts must therefore, if they are reasonable in their arguments, abandon the proposition that obedience to the Constitution or the exercise of any of the rights or privileges created by the rules of the Senate in pursuance of the Constitution is either treasonable in form or in substance. If there be treason or obstruction to the public business it cannot be in the motion to adjourn or in the motion to go into executive session, however often it may be made, so long as it is authorized by the rules of the Senate made in pursuance of the Constitution. If "treason in substance" can be found, which the Senators from Massachusetts and Illinois have discovered, this treason must be found, if at all, either in the purpose of those making it or in the effects which result from the action of those making these motions.

In order, then, to form a correct judgment of the effect of preventing this election or the passage of this resolution, it is necessary that we should consider the good or the evil that will result from the election of these officers and the passage of this resolution.

It may be true that the passage of this resolution may involve effects dangerous to the public liberty and to the continuance of just legislation in this country. It may be that in the judgment and conscience of one half the Senate duly elected here there are grave doubts whether the majority, if there be a majority in favor of this resolution, has not been procured by means unfriendly to the Constitution and the laws, and condemned by the just public opinion of the country.

Something more, therefore, may be involved in the passage of this resolution than the mere election or defeat of the officers proposed and designated in it. Those who give it countenance and support, those who fail to do all in their power to defeat it, may become particeps criminis in the commencement of a practice the proper and necessary effect of which will be to substitute mercenary and venal considerations for the just and unbiased judgment of Senators and to constitute political power in the hands of majorities different from those elected by the people, by the use of the offices of the Senate and of the patronage of the Government.

It may be possible if this resolution shall pass that we shall either willingly or unwillingly become parties to a transaction in which the official places of the Senate and the patronage of the Government may in the future be used to induce Senators to support public measures which they were sent here under obligations to their people to oppose, and to which their own constituencies demand their opposition.

Let us calmly and in good temper consider the facts of this case and see what they are; what conclusions they demand in the light of reason and in the just judgment of the country. Let us see how far they are consistent with the preservation of our form of Government and our Constitution and liberties; how far they demand a continued and patriotic resistance to the passage of this resolution, and the approval of the bargain, if any has been made.

I propose to investigate these propositions and the facts of the case.

The facts upon which a correct judgment of the whole case depends are few in number and are of public record. We need not therefore trespass on private ground or personal feelings.

The Legislature of Virginia in 1880 elected a Senator of the United States who was distinguished from other democrats in the State of Virginia and in the United States by no other opinion than that he was in favor of a repudiation of a part of the debt of the State of Virginia. A majority of those who elected this Senator were, like him, democrats, elected as such, and differing from their fellow-democrats only on the question of the obligation of the State debt and the proportion of it which should be paid.

Of these facts there can be no question or denial. The evidences of their truth are the declarations of the Senator himself, contemporaneously, before, and after the act, and since and up to this time, and in the public records and the public acts of the State.

Whether there was any express pledge as to any particular course of public or political action is immaterial. Such pledges are not usually required or given in words; they are implied from a man's past public life; from his acceptance of trusts conferred upon him with the recognized obligation of representing the declared political opinions of those who confer it, except in cases where the contrary is expressly understood. Long after the election of the distinguished Senator to the Senate the new Senator from Virginia and his supporters declared the success of the democratic party and the democratic organization of the United States in the election of General Hancock to the Presidency to be necessary for the public good.

And then as in all their past history affirmed his and their identity with them in principle and in all their party aims, excepting only the payment of the public debt of the State of Virginia.

Now what conclusion, if any, results from this fact pertinent to this case and relative to our duty in connection with the resolution now pending before the Senate? The proposition of fact is that the Senator from Virginia in November last assured the Senate and the country that the republican party was essentially dangerous to the public liberty, and would be and must be opposed by him in all forms and shapes. The opinions of years do not change without cause, nor in a day. The human mind is governed by law; and thought, impalpable and subtle as it is, is controlled by moral law. We may say that a man cannot change an opinion or belief without a reason. Nothing has occurred in the public history of this country since November last which could possibly change any man's political status from a democrat to a republican.

The conclusion demanded by the facts is that the Senator from Virginia has always been and is now opposed in opinion to the republican party, although for some unexplained reason acting with them. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has found this reason in the fact that the Senator from Virginia and his candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Riddleberger, favor a free ballot and a fair count. The Senator from Virginia has also vindicated his support of the republican party and his present opposition to what he calls the machinery of the democratic party by his alleged love for a free ballot and a fair count.

The Senator from Massachusetts, standing, according to his own simile, with his foot upon the necks of a hundred thousand white laboring-men of Massachusetts, to whom he denies a free ballot, ostentatiously declares his support of the new democratic Senator from Virginia and his nominees because he says he is in favor of a free ballot and a fair count in Virginia, where by law and practice the ballot is free and the vote and the count have always been fair.

But this will not avail him, because if the ballot has not been free in Virginia, as is insisted by him, and the count has not been fair because, as he says, of democratic practices and democratic control, as is the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, then the distinguished Senator from Virginia whom he supports has borne a leading part in making that ballot not free and in making the count unfair.

The affirmation of the contrary because the declaration of principles of the readjuster or repudiation party of Virginia contains a declaration in favor of free suffrage and a free ballot is nothing. Every platform in every Southern and every Northern State contains this declaration—even in Massachusetts and in Rhode Island and in several Northern States where the suffrage is not free either in fact or in name, or in theory, or in law, or in practice.

In Massachusetts, where many thousand men are deprived of the ballot by law; in Rhode Island, where a small part of the population alone are allowed the ballot; in many, in all I may say, of the highly civilized and densely populated States no means has yet been found, under economic and social laws which concentrate and distribute wealth, by which a free ballot can in fact be given to a majority of the people.

These, Mr. President, are pretenses and have no foundation in fact or in reason.

The Senator from Massachusetts must know that if there is a man in the State of Virginia standing with his foot on the neck of the enfranchised freedmen of Virginia that man has always been and is now the new Senator from Virginia, identified with the democratic party, responsible as much as any and all up to the 4th of March for whatever errors of policy and subject to commendation for whatever benefits may have been bestowed by that party. If to be a democrat is to stand on the neck of a freedman and to deny him a free ballot, it cannot be denied that the Senator from Virginia and his candidate, Mr. Riddleberger, have stood, and did until the republican caucus met after the 4th of March stand, in that attitude and in that position.

It follows, then, that on the 4th of March the Senator from Virginia and his candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms stood before the country, by the record of their whole public life, active, earnest democrats, except that they were in favor of principles relating to the public debt of Virginia which denied its binding validity and obligation as contradistinguished from the Bourbon democrats—if Bourbons they are—of the State of Virginia, and by no other possible distinction. The republican caucus met, and in a few hours the Senator from Virginia held the votes of our republican friends apparently, so far as the records of this body show, pledged to the support of his nominees for the official places of the Senate. One of these nominees is a Mr. Riddleberger, for Sergeant-at-Arms, the active partisan leader of the Senator from Virginia in the campaign now going on in the State of Virginia for the control of the political power of that State in the interest of the repudiation of the State debt.

It is proposed by this resolution to give the whole great patronage of the Senate to aid in the election of a repudiator to the United States Senate in the coming election in Virginia; to elect repudiators to Congress from that State; to place the control of the government of Virginia and all its political power in the hands of those who deny the principles upon which the validity of its public debt rests.

This is the effort, this is the direct effect. Is it the natural, the usual, the proper result of a republican party caucus?

The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois deny that the appointment by themselves and their caucus as a party of certain individuals and their nomination for office is in itself an approval of all their opinions, and in support of this proposition they ask the question whether the Senator from Delaware in voting for gentlemen who were not in favor of hard money or specie resumption was an approval by him of their financial opinions. They also take the example of some confederate officer, and ask whether a vote for him would be an approval of his past opinions and conduct.

The truth of argument and reason in this proposition is easily discernible, and cannot be disguised by the subtleties and sophistries of the Senators from Massachusetts and Illinois. Public position or office is sometimes conferred as a reward for political or partisan service. When so awarded it is certainly an approval of the person upon whom it is conferred, and to that extent it is an adoption of his opinions, an advice and an encouragement to others to pursue the same course; while, on the contrary, its refusal because of certain political action is a discouragement to that extent of the disapproved and unrewarded political action; and this proposition cannot be questioned or reasonably denied.

Political office is sometimes conferred because of special and superior competency and fitness for the duties of the office.

It is admitted by all that this is not the case here, because a change has to be made of officers fit and competent. It is clear that when office is so given it is an encouragement to others to become similarly qualified.

But however political office or preferment may be given, it has in all cases certain effects which are irrespective of the motive with which it is given. This effect is that, outside of the encouragement of example, it gives command of money, sometimes of patronage. In this case of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary of the Senate it gives both.

Now, will Senators deny that when a living political issue, urged by a living and active political party which has already obtained control partially of one of the States of the Union and is represented here by a Senator of the United States—when that living party is now engaged in a struggle for the absolute control of the Legislature of a State and of another Senator of the United States and for members of the other House, can it be denied that you are giving aid, comfort, and encouragement to that party and to its opinions, whatever they may be, by giving them and their leaders and supporters high official places, large official emolument, and extensive patronage? Giving aid and comfort and the means of extending their influence and accomplishing success is an approval of their opinions in the highest and most absolute sense—the sense of aiding mere opinion to become law and power by giving it active aid and comfort. Can it be denied that when you have elected, as you propose and are trying to do, members of Congress and two United States Senators who deny the principles on which rest the obligations of the national debt, who in practice apply theories to the debt of the State of Virginia which deny its binding obligation; when you have elected them with the patronage of the Senate—can you deny that you are giving aid and encouragement to the repudiation of the national debt?

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the nomination of Mr. Riddleberger by the republican caucus and his own support of him is simply because of his fitness for the place, and as a reward for and an encouragement to his support of a free ballot and a fair count. Let us examine and see if this is possible—if it is not denied by the laws which govern human action and are the accepted indices of human motive and of all party action.

A political party is an association which proposes to accomplish certain proposed public measures or lines of public policy which they have in common.

No person can belong to such an association without sharing their common purpose. When the power of this association ceases to be used for the promotion of the common object, whether that object be an object of wise public policy covering the well-being of the State, or whether it is mere division of the spoils, it would cease to be an association with a common object. In either case it would be impossible and against all the laws which control public policy to take into the association a person inimical to its objects. He must bring some aid and support to its common policy, or, in the latter case, some assistance toward securing the spoils to be divided.

Now, Mr. President, I ask what object in common, what political fellowship and sympathy was there on and after the 4th March between the new Senator from Virginia, a democrat of the democrats in everything except the payment of the debts of the State of Virginia, and the republican party and its Senators here? What political fellowship and sympathy was there between Mr. Riddleberger, the debt-repudiating democrat and the confederate brigadier of the State of Virginia, and the republican party and its Senators here?

Mr. President, no man will deny, not even the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] that there was none.

The Senator will not affirm that he has any evidence beyond the empty declarations of a political platform, which was the same with that of every other political party of every other State, that these gentlemen were in any respect contradistinguished from other men, either republicans or democrats, by special advocacy and support of a free ballot and a fair count. They were democrats demanding the election of Hancock and the success of the national democratic party as essential to the security of all public and private rights; and this the Senator from Massachusetts and all other Senators on the other side have time and again denounced as the sum of all political villainies and utterly inconsistent with sound political morals.

How is it, I ask, that these gentlemen alone of all the others still unrepentant have in a few hours with their sins as scarlet become as white as snow? In the waters of what Jordan have they been cleansed? Where is the Pool of Bethesda in which they were healed and decorated with wreaths of triumph and clothed with the royal purple?

Without imputing anything personally wrong to any of the Senators, I say that this is an evil example for the Republic. I say we must reflect long and anxiously before we can passively or actively consent to place the high and influential offices of the Senate in the hands of persons who it is known will use them for placing in power those who will come here as the open and zealous advocates and representatives of principles fatal to the public debt and in absolute denial of all the principles of the constitutional amendment declaring the perpetual validity and binding obligation of the public debt of the United States.

Will you deny gentlemen, any of you, that the bill of Mr. Riddleberger, the candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms, which was passed in the Legislature of Virginia, and is still in agitation there, does deny all the principles upon which the public debt of the United States rests for its perpetual and continued obligation? You cannot truthfully deny it. If the bill passed by Mr. Riddleberger, and the doctrine upon which it rests, should be passed in every other State of this Union, and Senators and Representatives here in Congress affirm it, I say here that it will be fatal to the public debt of the United States.

Will you deny, gentlemen, that to bestow the offices of the Senate intended for the convenience of the Senate in the transaction of its public business, not as a reward for party services or fidelity to convictions of public duty, but in such a way as to promote the success of principles and parties disapproved by both the great political parties of the country, disapproved by those who bestow these offices, condemned by the entire public judgment of the country of all parties, in order to obtain a majority in the Senate not bound together by any common convictions of public duty or public policy, is an act which if continued will become fatal not only to the control of public legislation by the honest and intelligent action of Senators, but to the continuance of honorable party organization itself?

How can you distinguish between the direct use of the current coin of the realm and the public patronage to influence and control the votes of the Senate or the public legislation of the country? I affirm that there is no distinction in principle.

Is there nothing, then, Mr. President and Senators, in the peculiar circumstances of this case which distinguishes it from an ordinary case of bestowing the political patronage of the country upon a political party which has obtained before the people a majority to control its legislation? To my mind there is. To my mind, and acting for myself, I hold it to be my duty to resist such a combination, and to resist the resolution proposing to bestow the political patronage upon a coalition of parties diverse in political principles, diverse in their public pledges and assurances to the country. I hold it to be the first duty of a Senator to resist by all constitutional means the consummation of such an act.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that a large number of nominations were sent by the President to the Senate on the day before yesterday, a large number sent on yesterday, and again to-day, all of which lie upon your table, not referred to the appropriate committees; in view of the further fact that there is now pending in the Senate a large number of nominations, some of which are for judicial officers for the various judicial tribunals from the highest to the lowest in the country, other nominations pending for foreign ministers and consuls, to say nothing of the minor grade of officers whose nominations are now pending; and in view of the additional fact that there are treaties with foreign nations pending in the Senate which demand the consideration of the Senate, and the additional fact that this session of the Senate was convened by the President for the consideration of executive business only, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) On this issue I am paired with the honorable Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the present with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] But for that pair I should vote in favor of proceeding to the consideration of the business for which the Senate was convened.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily upon this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—24.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	Groome,	Saunders,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Sewell,
Brown,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Butler,	Farley,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Garland,	Plumb,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Now, by unanimous consent, we might get a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts asks general consent to have a vote upon his resolution. I have wrestled with him for two or three days endeavoring to persuade him that he is making a great mistake in pressing this resolution. I not only have failed to make any impression upon him, but he was so unkind yesterday as to say to the Senate, among other things, that while he had a decent respect personally for myself, "Heaven forgive me if thereby I should be responsible for the perverse, absurd, and, as I think, wicked political doctrines that he is constantly announcing;" and he endeavored to show that if there was any man anywhere who entertained perverse political doctrines he would not under any circumstances follow him or indorse him.

Mr. DAWES. My friend misunderstood me.

Mr. BECK. You are now following some perverse fellows, are you?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator misunderstood me. Would he like to understand me?

Mr. BECK. I do not think I ever misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I will restate my position. I said that I had the utmost confidence in the Senator from Kentucky personally, and I would be very glad to vote for him for Sergeant-at-Arms; but if by so voting I was to become responsible for his political opinions, the Lord have mercy upon me! But I would vote for him because I do not believe when voting for so good a man as the Senator from Kentucky for that office I should become responsible for the strange doctrines which he advocates here.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts is endeavoring to flatter me now. It is his way, and therefore I am not going to quarrel with him about that. But he became very eloquent yesterday when he was endeavoring to show that the great reason why he was urging the nomination of Mr. Riddleberger was that his protegé was standing up for the rights of the colored race against the oppression of the Bourbon democracy, and that he was a man who was seeking to elevate and maintain all those just relations that he thought were indispensable to the public good. His sentiments were noble. Not giving the Senator up yet, and still desiring that he should consider the propriety of his course in regard to Mr. Riddleberger, I have a copy in my hand of the Richmond Whig of some years ago, which is the advocate, I believe I heard it said yesterday by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] of the readjusters. Is that not the fact?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. BECK. Some years ago when the Legislature of Virginia was in session a discussion came up in regard to the question of repudiation. A colored man, Mr. Moss, rose in his place and said, as the Richmond Whig reports, what I shall read. At the head of this Richmond Whig, let me state, the Senator will observe is a man with his foot on the neck of another, and the words "Sic semper tyrannis" as the motto:

Mr. Moss (colored) had not learned from the speeches that had been made whether Virginia owed the debt at all.

He was evidently an illiterate man. In all probability he could not now vote in Massachusetts. Perhaps he could neither read nor write nor sign his name, and therefore if he had lived in Massachusetts instead of Virginia he would have been disfranchised, but he was not only allowed to vote in the State of Virginia but he was a member of the Virginia Legislature.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Allow me to finish this statement first. There is plenty of time; there is no hurry now, we are going slow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. BECK. In response to the challenge of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] when that distinguished Senator, who had been filibustering successfully for two weeks, announced that it had become a question of endurance, my friend from Georgia said, "We will endure with you." I repeat, I will endure with you; you need not hasten this debate. Mr. Moss evidently had not found out about all these questions. He was not advised whether Virginia owed the debt at all; but he proceeded to say:

If she did she should act as an individual would act in her situation. Was for paying every dollar the State owed, yet had not forgotten that he was a slave when the debt was contracted; nor did he forget that the destiny of Virginia was his destiny. His property was as good for taxes as any other man's property. Some said that the State was bankrupt, others that the debt was contracted on the faith of slave property, and as that property had been swept away the debt was no longer binding. He thus summed up: If it is a just debt we owe it and must pay it.

Well said, was it not?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. It was said like an ignorant man but like an honest one.

Being asked by Mr. Goodwin (colored) whether he was for or against the resolution, he replied that he was against anything like repudiation. He was then asked if the resolution had repudiation in it? He replied that he had not read it. The speech was a rambling sort of sermon and was very long. Mr. Moss finally gave way for Mr. Riddleberger to offer a resolution—

The poor man surrendered his right as a matter of courtesy to a distinguished gentleman who is now indorsed by a republican caucus unanimously, doubtless supposing him to be a friend.

Mr. Moss finally gave way for Mr. Riddleberger to offer a resolution, which turned out to be a resolution to expel the member from Buckingham [Mr. Moss] as a nuisance! It was put and rejected.

That honest, simple-minded colored man, because he was willing to pay the debt and allow his property to be taxed or taken to maintain the honor of the old State in which he was born and in which he had been a slave, was sought to be expelled on a resolution by the nominee of this republican caucus when he had given way to Mr. Riddleberger, the gentleman who is now championed as the man who ought to be honored in the Senate and invested with nearly all its patronage by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

It is for that reason among others that I desire the Senator to take longer time to see whether these facts reported by a friendly organ, in addition to what I said to him yesterday, will not induce him to abandon a position which I think will not be creditable either to himself or to his party. I will give him Sunday to pray over it, and, as he has no faith in the prayers of those he regards as the wicked, of course I shall not undertake to help him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not hear very distinctly, but is it possible that the Senator from Kentucky said that Moss was a colored man?

Mr. BECK. Moss was a colored man who sought to pay the debt of the State, fairly and honestly, and Mr. Riddleberger moved in the Legislature to expel him. The Richmond Whig gives the account, which I will hand to the Senator from Indiana, and at the head of it, as I observed, with the motto "sic semper tyrannis," stands one man with his foot on the neck of another, and I think that must be Riddleberger on Moss. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROOME. Let me ask a question. Does it appear from the report whether Mr. Riddleberger proposed to expel this man because he was a colored man or because he was in favor of paying the debt of the State?

Mr. BECK. Poor fellow, I suppose Riddleberger took the double chance on him. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.] I move that the Senate do now adjourn in order to give the Senator from Massachusetts time to look into this matter. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the occupants of the galleries that order must be preserved. It is against the rules to make any demonstration whatever. The Chair would also remind Senators not to set the example to the galleries. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the Senate adjourn, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am still paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon this and similar questions with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Beck,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,
	Johnston,

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Hale,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Teller.
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—22.

Anthony,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Vance,
Brown,	Garland,	Platt of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	George,	Plumb,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Saunders,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Sewell,
Farley,	Kellogg,	Slater,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. As the Senate has refused to adjourn for any such consideration as that suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, I hope now we may proceed to vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee and take the sense of the majority of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, let us vote.

Mr. DAWES. I am anxious to reach a vote upon the resolution to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to indefinitely postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. All of these motions which obstruct the public business I hope we shall proceed to vote upon at once, in order that we may get at the resolution and be able to transact the business which is properly before us.

Mr. HARRIS. As there are no vacancies in the officers or employés of the Senate, and there are a number of vacancies in important offices, which the President has made nominations to fill, where official terms have expired but cannot be filled until the Senate acts upon these nominations one—that I may mention as a conspicuously important case—a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the fact familiar to all of us that only a few days since that tribunal had to adjourn for the want of the presence of members of the court sufficient to make a quorum—it is important that these vacancies in important offices should be filled. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so that we may fill vacancies that actually exist, and not waste time in a mere scramble for a few small offices, postponing and delaying the public business to the prejudice of the public interest.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the Senator will allow me to say that because of pressing business of a public nature I hope we may proceed first in order to organize the Senate——

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina will state his point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. My point of order is that the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable. The Senator from Massachusetts was proceeding by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am still paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	George,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Slater,
Camden,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.
Coke,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Sherman.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Miller,

ABSENT—23.

Anthony,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Brown,	Farley,	McPherson,	Vance,
Butler,	Ferry,	Platt of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Plumb,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Saunders,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Sewell,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, it was my misfortune to be absent from the Chamber yesterday by reason of severe indisposition. I am not well to-day. I have had no opportunity, by reason of my absence yesterday, to review the allusions made in the course of the debate to myself and the candidate before this body for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, which I desire now to say to the Senate I shall take occasion to review.

Mr. DAWES. Would it be more agreeable to the Senator to make his remarks on Monday? If so, I shall move to adjourn, with his consent.

Mr. MAHONE. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, March 28, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business at the close of the last day's session, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for the election of certain officers of the Senate. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator from Virginia seems at this very moment not to be here, I ask that the resolution be read which we are asked to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Virginia is present, I will say to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware of that, but in order to give him a single moment——

Mr. HARRIS. I thought the Senator said the Senator from Virginia was not present.

Mr. CONKLING. I said not present at the very moment in his seat; and in order to give him a single moment for his convenience, I ask for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course there can be no objection to that.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DAWES on the 23d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of its Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, my profound respect for the wisdom and experience of my seniors in this Chamber compels me to renew expression of the reluctance with which I so soon intrude upon its deliberations. Senators and the country will concede that to this seeming forwardness I have been provoked.

If I do not challenge generous consideration from those who would appear to have found pleasure in their unjustifiable assaults, I do not doubt that I shall command the respect of the brave and independent here, as I know I shall command that of my own people. I shall not complain of the intolerance and indirection which have characterized the allusions of some Senators to myself. Doubtless they comport entirely with their own sense of manly deportment and senatorial dignity, however little they do with mine. Virginia is accustomed to meet occasions where the independent spirit of the Anglo-Saxon is required to assert itself; Virginia has ever met, with fortitude and dignity, every duty that destiny has imposed, always, however, with much contempt for small party tactics where principles were involved to which her faith and her honor were committed.

With absolute confidence in my loyalty to her and my devotion to every interest of her people, I shall not relax my purpose to repel every impeachment of the constituency which sent me here with clearly defined duties which they and I comprehend. I was elected to the Senate of the United States to do their will, not to a caucus to do its petty bidding. Virginia earned her title of the Old Dominion by the proud and independent action of her own people, by the loyalty of her sons to the instincts of independence, without help at the hands of those who would now interfere with her affairs.

However feebly I may assert that spirit against the gratuitous and hypocritical concern for her of strangers to her trials, her sacrifices, and her will, I feel that the spirit of my people inspires me when I scornfully repel for them and for myself ungracious attempts to instruct a Virginia Senator as to his duty to them and to himself. Senators should learn to deal with their constituencies, while I answer to mine.

To him who would insinuate that my action in respect to the organization of the committees of this body and the proposed election of its officers has been governed or controlled by impure considerations—and I am loth to believe that any honorable Senator has so intended—in the language of another, I say:

> If thou said'st I am not peer
> To any lord in Scotland here,
> Lowland or highland, far or near,
> Lord Angus, thou hast lied!

And now, Mr. President, permit me to say that Senators can no more realize my regret than they can measure my amazement that my colleague should have felt it incumbent upon him to join the assaulting column in this Chamber. He first introduces the consideration of my political consistency, and he next introduces me, with the eighty-odd thousand of his fellow-citizens who sent me here, to this honorable body as a repudiator of public obligations. The sense of justice of fellow Senators renders it unnecessary for me to apologize for noticing my colleague's criticisms on the one hand and his perversions on the other. However much he and his friends may endeavor, by the chop-logic of the attorney, to demonstrate what I ought to be, I know by my convictions and by my sense of duty what I am. In this particular I have largely the advantage of my colleague; for if I take him by his record, diminutive as it is, he neither knows what he was, what he is, or what duty he came here to perform. A very brief recital of Virginia political history, covering but a decade, will give a clear view of the Virginia situation as it is represented on this floor. My colleague gave the first page, and then, like the lazy, truant schoolboy, skipped many pages, or, like the shifty lawyer, read only so much of the authority as suited his case. I am duly grateful to him for the small meed of praise he would deal out to me for the humble part I bore in the great liberal movement of 1869, which was undertaken to return our State to her normal condition in the Union.

I am the more grateful because the organs of the faction he represents here have recently published columns to prove that I was breathed into political existence subsequently to that momentous period. Not being sworn, my colleague thought it was sufficient for him to tell the truth without the usual obligation to tell the whole truth. It is now my privilege, as well as duty, to supply all deficiencies. The views I entertained then I still adhere to, and though, as far as my information goes, we had no material assistance from him in that severe and trying ordeal of 1869, I do know that after his election to this body he confessed himself in entire accord with all that had been done by Virginia as a condition-precedent to her restoration, and with the zeal of a new convert expressed the hope that other States of the Union without the same propelling cause should do likewise. In a letter addressed to the then governor of Virginia (Walker) he wrote as follows:

JOHNSTON TO GOVERNOR WALKER IN 1869.

Believing fully not only that we in Virginia could not prosper, but that our continued exclusion from the Union interfered with the business of the whole country, I have been anxious for an early compliance with the reconstruction laws, and that the State should itself inaugurate some movement similar to that which resulted in your election for the purpose, and not wait, like Micawber, "for something to turn up."

* * * * * * *

The fifteenth amendment, which I trust will soon be adopted by States enough to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States, will end a question which has agitated the country for half a century. I entirely approve of the principles of that amendment, and as we have invested the freedman with the right to vote, let us give him a fair opportunity to vote understandingly. He has civil rights, and it is our interest he should know their value.

* * * * * * *

That we are apparently so near to the consummation of reconstruction we are greatly indebted to President Grant's kind offices. The State was in a dilemma; it wanted a constitution; but the one made for it has at least two very objectionable features. We felt that we were suffering in all our material interests by staying out of the Union, and yet to go in under the constitution with all its provisions would have been worse.

The Gordian knot was happily cut by the President's first message to Congress and the prompt response of that body. Up to this time the conduct of the administration has been liberal, and if the same policy is pursued hereafter it ought to have the hearty support of this State. If we cast dead issues behind us and look only to that line of conduct which shall restore quiet and confidence, and encourage enterprise and industry, we shall even see the country richer and more prosperous than it has ever been.

This movement in 1869 accomplished the restoration of our State under the expurgated constitution and gave us representation here in the persons of my colleague and ex-Senator Lewis. We were relieved of military government, became rehabilitated in our sovereignty, with entire control of our local autonomy. Thus, for a period, Virginia seemed to be enjoying the full freedom of her long-deferred hope for peace. And but for what I shall hereafter advert to she would have had peace indeed. Following the recital of my colleague, who fixes my next appearance on the political stage with the election of Governor Kemper in 1873, I would respectfully invite his attention to what was regarded as the true status of the conservative party in Virginia at that time. I would ask the Clerk to read from the first message of Governor Kemper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POLITICAL PARTY RELATIONS.

The duties imposed upon us in the existing crisis, involving the reconstruction of the foundations of society, impel us to be guided by higher considerations than ordinarily control political party organizations. Of the people who confided to us our present trusts, a great majority is not identified with any existing national political party; and although they were formerly divided among opposing parties, they now stand united upon common conservative principles. Adhering to those principles, Virginia seeks these ends: to secure and maintain her full constitutional rights and relations, and to perform all her constitutional duties as one of the coequal members of the Union; to exercise all rightful powers of self-government and to determine, adjust, and regulate the internal, domestic, and municipal interests of her people, their relations and rights, including such as are known as civil rights, in strict conformity to the Federal Constitution and the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States expounding recent amendments thereto, and the respective powers of the Federal and State governments thereunder; to obtain an equitable settlement of her just claims against the common government; to promote universal reconciliation upon the basis of equal justice to all the States and people; to cultivate harmonious relations with the common government, and to yield a liberal support to every department thereof co-operating in the accomplishment of the ends thus sought. Virginia, recognizing no such obligations as bind her to any national party organization, maintaining her fidelity to all who are and who shall become allies in the defense of measures calculated to secure the ends named, is ready to co-operate cordially with men of whatever party in upholding those measures, by whomsoever proposed, supporting those who support them, and opposing all opposition to them.

One of the articles announcing the principles and purposes recently ratified by an overwhelming majority of our people declares that, disclaiming all purpose of captious hostility to the present executive head of the Federal Government, "We will judge him impartially by his official action, and will co-operate in every measure of his administration which may be beneficent in design and calculated to promote the welfare of the people and cultivate sentiments of good-will between the different sections of the Union." This article was no political expedient of the hour. It embodies the sentiments of honorable men, and binds by the obligations of good faith and justice. It pledges such liberal support as may be consistent with our principles and justified by the developments of the future. I recommend its reaffirmation by the General Assembly, if no untoward event occur to forbid such action.

Let none suppose that we attach importance to the dispensation of the official patronage of the Federal Government in Virginia, or take interest in it beyond desiring to see appointments conferred upon honest and capable men. If any imagine our people can be influenced by such paltry considerations, they fail to comprehend the moral and political level on which we stand.

In a period of declining political partisanship, when national parties seem to be in process of transition and transformation, Virginia stands upon her own firm ground of catholic patriotism, of constitutional justice and equality, of universal peace and reconciliation; ground broad enough and fit, if not destined, to be occupied by all good men of all parties.

Mr. MAHONE. Thus, Mr. President, am I indorsed by the highest Virginia authority in what I then believed and now maintain to be the true principles, the object and aim of Virginia Conservatism, which was then the common political designation of those with whom I co-operated. The sentiments of that governor were the sentiments of our people; they are the sentiments of my constituency to-day, and I mean to respect and assert them here. I think the people of Virginia are as ready now as in 1873 "to judge the Executive by his official action, and to co-operate in every measure of his administration which is beneficent in design and calculated to promote the welfare of the people and cultivate sentiments of good will between the different sections of the Union." I believe still that this declaration "was no political expedient of the hour," but that it embodied the sentiments of all Virginians who are incapable of dissimulation, even in the manufacture of party platforms. Virginians now, as then, want their real interests and true principles represented, and will no longer feed upon the husks of a maudlin sentimentalism. They feel as they did when the lamented R. T. Daniel, as chairman of the conservative party, telegraphed congratulations to the President on the success of a policy of kindness toward them, and they are not less desirous now for mutuality of respect and confidence.

In the curious panoramic exhibition of my colleague I next appear as a candidate for governor in 1877. To be a candidate in Virginia is a privilege which every qualified voter may constitutionally exercise, and in that year there were three prominent candidates other than those named by the Senator. Two of them had been major-generals and one a brigadier-general. What an omission! Shades of departed glory defend us! when a United States Senator of the Bourbon persuasion can omit imposing titles in detailing events with which they were intimately associated. 'Tis true I was not nominated, lacking forty votes of a certain majority of a convention composed of over fourteen hundred delegates against a combination of five candidates, one of whom my colleague preferred, that preference perhaps being based upon motives as unselfish as are usual in veteran politicians and officeholders.

Mr. President, I can scarcely hope, in the presence of this body, where my colleague has served for many years, and where the altitude of his statesmanship frowns contemptuously down upon all who would aspire to reach its summit, to attain the awful diffidence with which I should undertake to correct any of his statements. He is one of the conscript fathers of the Senate, old in all its ways and usages; and long absence from his constituency and perpetual service to the national democratic party in helping to organize its numerous defeats make him forgetful of recent events in Virginia. Hence the necessity of my attempting to inform him as to certain matters of recent history at home.

"The next event," says my colleague, "was that the readjusters separated themselves from the democratic party;" and after treating this at some length he says, "This brings us down to what is called Mozart Hall convention," in which, he adds, "I spoke of the conservative party as though I belonged to it."

Mr. President, I confess my inability to understand all this curious mixture of the odds and ends of my colleague's scrap-book. He parades his facts in curiously-contrived array. He empties his ill-assorted jewels of information and "chunks of wisdom," and seems to rely upon Senators to give them that consecutive arrangement as to fact and date which they have, possibly, in his own great mind. But, sir, the fact is there was no remarkable incident in Virginia politics between the election of 1877 and 1879, the month of February of the latter year being the date of the assembling of the Mozart Hall convention. Certainly until February, 1879, there was no change in the status of parties in Virginia within that period. There was no organization of readjusters until February, 1879, and there was no declared democratic party until 1880.

This brings me, Mr. President, to a period when I propose to do more than follow my colleague in his half-way candid and nearly always inaccurate statement. It is at this juncture, he says, that Mr. Riddleberger and I are so much identified that he cannot separate us. It is at this point the organization of the readjusters begins; and it is at this point he appears to seek to make an impression wholly unwarranted by any act of the readjusters in Virginia. It is at this point, too, Mr. President, that I am constrained by a sense of duty to my people, my State, and myself to treat the question of our State debt as it presents itself in Virginia. In doing this, I wish it distinctly understood that I hold this to be a matter belonging exclusively to the State of Virginia, and I should repel any Federal interference with this as I would with any other question of mere State concern. I shall presume upon the indulgence of Senators because they have heard but one side, and that more than once, and I know they will be willing to hear a defense of Virginia against unjust attacks from those who ought to be her defenders.

Sir, there is not a fact upon which to base any one of the statements or arguments of my colleague. Instead of the Mozart Hall convention being held to effect a repeal of an irrepealable contract, it was a body of people assembled on a call of members of the General Assembly opposed to what is known in Virginia as the "brokers' bill." They assembled before that bill had passed either House of the General Assembly, and, coming fresh from the people, expressed their unqualified disapproval of that measure. It was apparent the measure was to pass, and organized opposition began. But, Mr. President, this is neither the beginning nor the end of this question. It was in 1871 that the first funding bill was enacted, and this we know in Virginia as the first contract.

I will not go into the details of this measure, as I shall ask the clerk to read a review of all the Virginia funding acts before concluding my remarks. It is my purpose now only to notice the speeches of Senators, notably that of my colleague, in this Chamber. It will be news to Senators to hear to-day that the readjusters never repealed either of the funding contracts. That enacted and only partially executed in 1866-'67 was in effect repealed by the Assembly which passed it, and the work of repeal was consummated by the Legislature that enacted the more obnoxious measure of 1871. This in turn was repealed by the Assembly of 1872, the propounder of the repeal measure being the present lieutenant-governor of the State, subsequently in full fellowship with the alleged debt-payers. Indeed this measure was so obnoxious that Governor Walker, who was conceded to be its author, subsequently urged that the Federal Government should assume the debts of the Southern States.

Mr. President, I might pause to inquire if that is a part of the doctrine of my colleague and the Senators who co-operate with him, when they stand here to represent the party for which Governor Walker then spoke, the pretended debt-payers of Virginia? It was this repeal bill which the Virginia court of appeals held to be unconstitutional, and here the matter rested until the State had accumulated interest arrears to over five million dollars, besides diverting one and a half million dollars which was dedicated by the constitution to the public free schools.

In 1877 what is known as the Barbour bill was proposed and passed, not a few of the latter-day self-styled debt-payers being among its most zealous supporters. Although this did not repeal in terms the original funding bill, it was nevertheless vetoed by the governor.

Such was our condition at the succeeding election—schools reduced 50 per cent., length of sessions abridged, asylums sustained by money borrowed from the banks—after exhausting every possible expedient, even to a reduction of judicial salaries, that a Legislature was returned pledged to a resettlement of this debt.

That settlement came in the form of the brokers' bill, for which my colleague stands at home and here the champion, aided and abetted by distinguished gentlemen on this floor. I commend the virtuous democracy of this Chamber to read that bill, and then tell this Senate whether there ever was a more undemocratic measure than the bill propounded in Virginia by the party whose cause they espouse.

That settlement came in the form of the broker's bill, as I have said, and this was the last repeal of the original contract. Yet my colleague would say the readjusters of to-day disregarded the court decisions. Surely he has not forgotten that he was upon the hustings in Virginia advocating each of the successive measures repealing the "irrepealable" contract, while in every instance the readjusters proper opposed the new measure.

But here again I am called upon to answer the charge of personal inconsistency. My colleague cannot ascertain that I opposed the funding scheme of 1871—a measure which, I assert without the fear of contradiction, not only repudiated but forcibly repudiated what my colleague understands to be one-third of the debt of Virginia. I suggest to my fellow-Senators on the opposite side to take care of that contamination of which they have warned the country in respect to the readjusters of Virginia.

My colleague adverted to the Richmond Whig, and proclaimed it as my mouth-piece. Mr. President, nobody speaks for me; I speak for myself. Why not have ascertained from the same source how I stood on the funding bill of 1871? Senators will not find that I ever supported the measure of 1871.

My colleague says again that I supported "Governor Kemper, who was an extreme debt-paying man and the friend of every bill that had ever been brought forward for the payment of the debt in full." I can give to Senators no better opportunity of learning what my colleague calls a debt-payer than by reading from Governor Kemper's first message to the General Assembly.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE UNITED STATES AND THE DEBT OF VIRGINIA.

While resolutely rendering full justice to all others, we seek with confidence that justice for want of which our State suffers. Virginia has just claims upon the United States, the consideration of which ought not longer to be postponed. In time of war, and as one of a series of war measures, the United States dismembered our State, making no provision in respect to her previously contracted debt, for the payment of which both the now dissevered parts had united in pledging the faith of the whole. The responsibility of the debt was left between Virginia and West Virginia, with no arrangement for its equitable distribution between them, and with such conflict of claims as renders any voluntary settlement or compromise on the part of the two States plainly impossible, while neither has such remedy as the exigency demands for enforcing an adjustment.

The United States, in controlling the dismemberment of Virginia, failed to adjust necessary terms of separation, failed to make any provision against the grave and perplexing difficulties which have resulted, and such failure has postponed and seriously interfered with the rights of public creditors, has left the seeds of alienation between States and between the people and the Government, has imposed upon us unjust burdens which repress the energies of our people, restrict our means of providing for public education, and hinder the material recovery of the State. The Government of the United States, by its action, prevented the State from fulfilling its obligations; it intervened disastrously between Virginia and her creditors, and cut the body of the debtor in twain with the sword.

In asking the United States to assume and discharge our State debt, or at least to so readjust its own work as to relieve us of unfair burdens, we are not involved in any discussion of the power of the Federal Government, under ordinary circumstances, to assume debts of the States. We are invoking that Government to perform a duty incident to war, and to exercise authority inherent in war-making power, by adjusting the incomplete acts and unrectified results of war, and by adjusting them in accordance with indisputable principles and precedents of equity and public law. If the Government of the United States should now, in the plenitude of its wealth and power, restore prosperity to our State by assuming her debt, a paltry burden on the national Treasury, but grievous to us in our poverty, it would only in small measure make return for the vast donation with which the munificence of Virginia endowed the Union in its weakness and infancy.

Mr. MAHONE. This is debt paying with a vengeance. It is a recommendation to pay the debt by the Federal Government; a proposition which never found favor with the readjusters, who held, and still hold, that Virginia should pay two-thirds of all the money she borrowed—the other being West Virginia's share by every principle of international law—and upon this principle pay such rate of interest as can be paid without an increase of the tax rate.

Nor is this all. After representatives of the council of foreign bondholders met commissioners of the State in Richmond, Governor Kemper, in a very lengthy appendix to his message, wrote what I ask to have read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Another of the propositions submitted is to retire and recapitalize the whole of the funded debt at 4 per cent., providing certificates for the deferred interest of 2 per cent. and paying 4 per cent. interest on such deferred certificates. In reference to that proposition it is pertinent to say that the people of Virginia have manifested profound dissatisfaction with the past action of the Government in funding arrears of interest, much of it war interest, in interest-bearing bonds; and they are likely to be slow in sanctioning any arrangement which would involve the payment of interest upon interest.

Mr. MAHONE. That Governor Kemper then agreed with us on the question of the funding of interest is fairly to be inferred from this extract, and therefore I have no more fault to find with my colleague for associating me with him in this matter than on that of the true status and real objects of conservatism.

The answer to my colleague's statement that "Governor Kemper was the friend and advocate of every bill that had ever been brought forward for the payment of the debt in full" is best answered by the governor himself. Therefore I shall beg the earnest attention of Senators to the following extracts from a special message in 1874, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The financial condition of the State has been misapprehended and misrepresented in many quarters. It is to be regretted that not only the ability but the willingness of the State to carry present indebtedness has been discussed, and the opinions and the purposes of both the legislative and executive departments have been subjected to injurious misconstruction among some of our creditors. In transmitting to the General Assembly the accompanying memorial of the council of foreign bondholders, I take occasion to note prevailing errors and to submit some considerations bearing upon the solution of our financial difficulties.

Public opinion is believed to have been misled partly by erroneous representations of our condition abroad and partly by miscalculations and errors of the authorities of Virginia in the past. The act of the 30th of March, 1871, commonly known as the funding act, unconditionally pledged the State to the regular and punctual payment thenceforward of full interest on the debt which it provided to be newly funded in the name of Virginia. This action appears to have been taken without due calculation of the diminished resources of the State, and without needful inquiry into the question of her ability to bear at this time the great burden thus assumed. One of the consequences is that, although the people are discontented and suffering under existing taxation, rendered very grievous to them by their impoverished circumstances, yet the revenues of the State have not enabled us to fulfill our new obligations. The practical operation of the funding act has proved equally unsatisfactory to both debtor and creditor. No question or doubt of the validity of the act itself and no impugnment of the motives of its authors is implied in the declaration that its passage was a surprise to our own people; that it was precipitately enacted, without such previous communication and understanding between the Commonwealth and her creditors, such discovery of the situation, such disclosure of the impoverished and almost ruined condition of the State, as our own necessities, a due respect for the creditor class and established usage in like cases imperatively demanded. The result is that the new bonds, designed to pledge the State to the payment of no more than two-thirds of the original debt, maintained no higher market value than that repeatedly reached and often exceeded prior to the date of the funding act by the old obligations which represented the whole debt. The result is that while our own people are more dissatisfied than ever, the complaints of creditors are increased instead of being quieted.

* * * * * * *

The assessed value of the real and personal property actually subjected to taxation in the State in 1860 was $585,099,382.77, while the official reports show that property of the value of $163,556,100 was exempted from taxation under the laws then in force, thus making the actual aggregate resources of the State in 1860 equal to $748,655,482.77. It appears from the same official sources that the aggregate value of real and personal property within the territory embraced in the present limits of Virginia was, in 1860, $632,204,191.65. The aggregate of assessed values of taxable property of every kind in Virginia, in 1873, was and it now is $336,686,433.23, and no more. Great and alarming as this decline in taxable values has been, the production of the State and the acreage of cultivated land are diminished in at least equal proportion. An illustration of our losses in production is to be found in the tobacco crop, which, grown almost exclusively within the present limits of Virginia, amounted in 1860, according to the census of that year, to 123,968,312 pounds, and which by the census of 1870 had in that year fallen to 37,086,364 pounds. Such losses in every kind of agricultural production are further shown, and in some measure accounted for, in the fact that of the population constituting a most valuable producing class before the war more than a half million now produce little, if anything, but a bare living for themselves.

In addition to all these evils a vast private indebtedness, incurred prior to the general destruction of public and private property by war, an indebtedness which greatly exceeds the whole public debt of the State, no inconsiderable part of which is due outside the Commonwealth, and all of which has been and is being pressed for payment, distresses our people and strains their uttermost resources and energies.

The present revenues of the State are large when compared with her resources. The State revenue for the last fiscal year, excluding costs of collection, amounted to $2,421,945.41; while for the same year the additional sum of $2,217,538.49, besides costs of collection, was drawn from the people in the shape of county, township, road, and local school taxes, making the net aggregate of $4,639,483.90 paid yearly in public taxes, while the aggregate of taxable values stands at $336,686,433.23. This amount of taxes is exclusive of the very considerable taxes paid to corporations, while a sum far larger than the amount of all taxes combined is annually drawn from the State by Federal taxes. If full interest should now be paid upon the debt assumed by the funding act, the amount of State and local taxes (excluding costs of collection—all Federal and corporation taxes) would necessarily be increased to the net sum of $5,964,425.77, for the revenues of the last fiscal year were less than enough to support the government and pay such full interest by the sum of $1,324,941.87.

Our real situation is not understood abroad, and has been greatly misrepresented. Public creditors, without knowledge of any peculiar embarrassments, have not rendered us the appreciation which better information would have commanded. If a fair investigation caused surprise, it will not be on account of what the State has failed to do, but what she has in the face of unprecedented difficulties accomplished. Besides enduring tremendous losses in men, labor, and capital; besides being borne down with an enormous private indebtedness; besides sustaining onerous Federal taxation, and meeting the new and great charge of caring for and educating the suddenly emancipated colored people, and administering justice among them; besides bearing the untimely and harassing burdens of a badly complicated government forced upon us by an obnoxious State constitution; without help from any quarter, and without having added a dollar to the principal of her debt by temporary loan or otherwise, Virginia has paid out since the close of the war more than five millions of dollars upon the principal and interest of her ante-bellum debt. It must be remembered that it is a wasted and mutilated State, shorn of one-third of her territory and more than half of her taxable values, struggling against the force of unparalleled distress and depression, that has rendered this firm proof of her determination to maintain her plighted faith. It may be safely affirmed that no other State and no considerable municipality carries an amount of debt so excessively disproportioned to its resources, or has under the greatest disadvantages accomplished so much, as Virginia. Notwithstanding any errors of the past, resulting from haste, transient excitement, or public distress, a full investigation is bound to satisfy the world of Virginia's willingness and purpose to perform all her obligations to the utmost extent of her ability.

Mr. MAHONE. Here, Mr. President, I submit this much of the case with a respectful admonition to my colleague to look well to the records before he again essays to state a fact concerning our public debt and our public men.

Passing over what appears in my colleague's speech as extracts from newspapers, to whose misstatements he has contributed a full share, I come now to notice his animadversions on the Riddleberger bill. If his criticisms were based on fact and a proper understanding of that measure, they would be unanswerable. He says that "the 'Riddleberger bill' has been substantially pronounced unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States." I ask him in what particular? Is it in this—that it does not recognize the interest that accrued during the war? If so, will my learned colleague inform me upon what principle of right he last summer sustained a measure which repudiated one-half of the interest that has accrued since the complete restoration of our State? Does he not know that that measure of forcible readjustment absolutely repudiated one-half of the accrued and unfunded interest, while the Riddleberger bill provides for paying it dollar for dollar? The difference is simply this: that since 1871 we have denied the right of the creditor to exact war interest and proposed to pay him all else in full. Our adversaries would and did fund that war interest and proposed to repudiate one-half of that which we are in honor and in law bound to pay.

Is it unconstitutional in that it pays but 3 per cent.? The only measure ever passed by the Virginia Assembly to pay as much as 4 per cent. and the only one under which one-third of our creditors have received a penny of interest, was introduced and patronized by Mr. Riddleberger. The first time that our Legislature ever voiced 3 per cent. was when they passed the brokers' job, the pet scheme of my colleague, so ably re-enforced in his advocacy of it on this floor by distinguished gentlemen on the other side, the Legislature then themselves admitting and declaring in the preamble of their bill that this is all the State can pay for ten years "without destroying its industries;" and last winter every legislator of their party voted to run the 3 per cent. for the whole time.

Is it unconstitutional in that it does not exempt the bonds from taxation forever, as the brokers' bill attempted to do, a feature peculiar to that measure for paying the debt of Virginia which my colleague advocates here? If so, I would respectfully refer my colleague to his State constitution, which says that all property shall be taxed equally and uniformly; that no one species of property shall be taxed higher than another, and that only such property as is used for religious, educational, and charitable purposes may be exempt from taxation. My learned colleague, who so unkindly characterized the patron of that bill as a county court lawyer, cites only Hartman vs. Greenhow as the case which holds this bill unconstitutional. That case decided no principle that this bill infringes. The Riddleberger bill imposes no tax upon bonds held either in or out of the State. It simply does not exempt any. By what authority, I would ask my colleague, can such a tax be made and collected? He must answer to the party which he undertakes to represent here for doing an unconstitutional act: to tax bonds of the State of Virginia held by a nonresident. The Riddleberger bill does not tax them. Whenever the General Assembly, carrying out the Riddleberger bill, shall endeavor to tax bonds held out of the State, it will be time for the Senator to renew the test in the Supreme Court of the United States and cite the precedent of Hartman vs. Greenhow.

Is it the much-discussed fourteenth section which is unconstitutional? If so I would remind my legal colleague that it is a verbatim copy of a statute passed by the State of Tennessee, adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States, and not only held by that high tribunal to be constitutional but proper legislation for the protection and maintenance of government. Is it unconstitutional in what is called its force feature? If so it has precedent in the bill of '71, which forbade the payment of any interest to a creditor who did not accept a reduction of one-third. It has precedent in the brokers' bill, which provided tax certificates to compete at a reduced price with the receivable coupon, and both of these measures found a hustings advocate in my colleague.

But he would imply that our debt was ascertained at a certain sum in pursuance of the State constitution, which he says was $29,667,304.76.

Mr. President, if there is any man in the party which my colleague represents who agrees with another member of that party in Virginia as to what the debt of that State is, we have yet to find the concurrence; it is with one leader this figure, with another leader another figure; by one report of their officers one sum, and then by another report of other officers a different sum. Grant that sum to be the true one; but let the Senator state that our constitution recognized no specific sum. It says there shall first be a settlement with West Virginia, which has not yet been had, and commands payment of what Virginia shall owe. That is the language, that is the instruction of the constitution of Virginia; that, after a settlement with West Virginia, covering one-third of old Virginia's territory, shall have been arrived at by an adjustment of their relative proportions of the public debt, Virginia will provide for her share. Now I would like the Senators from West Virginia in this cry against readjusters as repudiators to tell the country what answer they have made to their obligation for one-third of the debt contracted by the old Commonwealth of Virginia. Will they tell the country where they have ever made a proposition to pay one stiver of their share of the public debt of that State to maintain the honor and the dignity of their own Commonwealth? Let them answer.

It was the party of my colleague that repudiated the settlement of 1871 by the passage of the brokers' bill in 1879, and in turn attempted to repudiate the latter by unanimously indorsing what is known as the "Ross Hamilton bill." I suppose it would not suit my colleague to tell this audience who Ross Hamilton is. Yet, I beg Senators to take notice that the party of my colleague, after a winter spent in the vain effort to find a leader capable of devising means to overthrow the popular will, discovered such, as they supposed, in the person of Ross Hamilton, a colored republican member of the Legislature from the county of Mecklenburg, and blindly followed him to defeat. Hamilton's bill, which was thus unanimously supported by my colleague's party, not only in effect repealed their pet scheme, the brokers' bill, but all other acts in respect to the public debt of Virginia.

I come now to perform a duty—the most unpleasant in one sense and the most agreeable in another. It is to repel the charge flippantly, I hope inconsiderately, made on this floor that we are repudiators and our proposed measure dishonorable. To the first I reply that my colleague's party in eight years of administration of our State affairs paid 2 per cent. installments of interest on ten millions of our public debt just six times, or 12 per cent. in all; 6 times 8 would be 48 per cent. Instead of that they paid 12 per cent., and that is debt-paying!

Let this suffice. But when Senators apply the word dishonorable, they do not know either whom or what they characterize. Two things they have endeavored to demonstrate, and one is that I received a majority of the white conservative vote of both branches of the Virginia General Assembly. Proudly do I proclaim the truth of this. Every one of those who voted for me to come to this Chamber gave an unqualified vote for the Riddleberger bill. Are they dishonorable men? Scornfully do I repel the charge that any one of them is capable of dishonorable action.

Were it true, what a sad commentary it would be upon those honorable gentlemen whom it is said I am not representing here. Mr. President, my colleague comes from what we call in Virginia the great Southwest, a noble and prosperous section of Virginia. Fifteen white Conservative counties compose his congressional district, and though the ablest of the orators of my colleague's party canvassed it thoroughly against me and the views set forth in this measure, but two delegates and no senator of the gentleman's party came to the Legislature. To a man they supported the Riddleberger bill. Every senator and every delegate from my colleague's own congressional district, save and except two delegates, supported me for the Senate and the Riddleberger bill as a measure for debt-paying. He would do well to spend a little more time with his constituents!

Whatever our differences on this question, it seems to me those people should have had a defender in him against such foul and slanderous accusations as have been made—that they are dishonorable men. O Shame! where is thy blush? Dishonorable in Virginia to beg the privilege of paying every dollar she borrowed—that is, her rightful share, instead of not only paying that but also the share of West Virginia—dishonorable to pay every dollar she borrowed, only abating the war interest! Dishonorable, too, in the opinion of gentlemen who represent States on this floor and municipalities which have by arbitrary legislation reduced their indebtedness from $243,000,000 down to $84,000,000! Dishonorable in Virginia not only to assume her full share of her public obligations, as measured by her territory in this division of it, but offering to tax her people to an extent threatening the destruction of her industrial interests! Is that dishonorable in that people? If so, what have you to say of this tier of Southern States whose public indebtedness, whose plighted faith, whose sacred obligations—as sacred as are those of my State of Virginia—have been reduced from $243,000,000 by one or another method of repudiation, upon one or another excuse, down to $84,000,000, with a reduced interest rate upon the curtailed principal, and only proposing to pay interest in some cases at 2 per cent. and in others 3 and in others 4 on the reduced principal? Is it dishonorable in Virginia to assume $20,000,000 of the debt of the old State and then to tax her industries within the verge of endurance to pay on that sum the highest rate of interest? Let Senators who assail unjustly the conduct of Virginia in this respect put their own houses in order. I want, Mr. President, the Secretary to read from the International Review the measures of readjustment in the Southern States, that Senators may know how fashionable readjustment has been in that section of this great country on which northern democrats rely in a presidential election.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MAHONE. There is no mere readjustment there; I will not say it is repudiation. "Repudiation" is honorable, perhaps; "readjustment" dishonorable.

Oh, Virginia! It was for this you bared your bosom to soldier's tread and horse's hoof. It was for this you laid waste your fields. It was for this you displayed your noble virtues of fortitude and courage, your heroic suffering and sacrifice. It was for this you suffered the dismemberment of your territory and sent your sons to the field to return to the ruins where were once their homes. It was for this you so reluctantly abandoned your allegiance to a common country to be the last to make war and the last to surrender. O Ingratitude, thou basest and meanest of crimes!

Mr. President, as my colleague has transferred the question of readjustment from Virginia to this place by having the Riddleberger bill read at the Clerk's desk, I shall not lose this opportunity to present our side fully. But I desire it distinctly understood that I belong to that class of democrats who adhere to the view that the State has an inalienable right to control her domestic affairs in her own way, and that the question of Virginia's debt is of no more concern to the Federal Congress than that of the many readjusted debts of the other Southern States.

I shall now send to the Clerk's desk a paper to be read or to be incorporated with my remarks without reading, as Senators may prefer. I do not desire to weary the Senate with reading this documentary evidence. With permission that it shall go in as part of the RECORD and be considered a portion of my remarks, I will suspend the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What is the paper?

Mr. MAHONE. It is my published interview on the debt question.

The document is as follows:

The public debt of Virginia examined and determined, with a history of the various movements and schemes of settlement in connection with it.

[From the Philadelphia Press.]

The great concern manifested everywhere in the particularly interesting political situation in Virginia, and the widespread misconception which seems to prevail outside that State as to the real status of her public debt and the attitude of local parties toward it, recently led several gentlemen, representing various sections and interests, to seek an interview with General WILLIAM MAHONE, United States Senator-elect from Virginia, in which he was asked to impart to his interlocutors for general benefit his views on these subjects, with special reference to the much-mooted debt question. To this General MAHONE readily assented, expressing his pleasure, indeed, at an opportunity which enabled him to vindicate Virginia and her people about a matter that had been grossly misrepresented. It is a and a long story, said the general, but to a correct and enlightened understanding of it its history must be told. In 1861, at the outbreak of the civil war, Virginia possessed a territory one-third larger and a populption one-fifth greater than she does to-day. Then she held large and valuable interests in the public works and the banks of the Commonwealth—her share in the latter alone contributing annually $368,850 to her treasury. These were either destroyed or impaired at an absolute loss to her of full forty millions of dollars. Then her people were in easy financial circumstances and prosperous, the owners of a large property, of which in personalty alone they have suffered direct deprivation to an amount not less than five hundred millions in value, much of which was taxable. Then the property of all kinds assessed with taxes in Virginia was greater than now by $317,660,000, and now amounts to only $267,439,000; and then her public debt was $31,188,000, with an annual liability for interest of $1,850,000, while the McCulloch bill would arbitrarily impose a debt of $33,228,671 upon the Virginia of to-day, shorn of her territory, decimated in her population, and beggared in all her resources; a debt greater than that of any other State of the Union, to crush and paralyze the State which suffered most of all by the war![1] The

LARGE SUBJECT

in the year 1859-'60, on a levy of forty cents upon the one hundred dollars of assessed value, was $3,936,874. In 1880-'81, when every species of property is taxed, her revenue cannot be counted upon for more than $2,100,000 net, although the levy is now, since 1871, fifty cents.[2] And whereas formerly the State levy of forty cents was substantially the whole extent of our public burden, now the aggregate of city county, State, and Federal exactions equal a tax of 3¼ per cent. on the assessed value of property, or $3.33¼ on every one hundred dollars of our taxable values.[3]

The expenses of the State government now, under the most frugal administration, cannot be put at less than $1,400,000, including the constitutional charge of the free schools, and averaged about $1,600,000 until the readjusters came into power.[4] Yet our interest account, under the McCulloch bill, would stand for the year 1879 at $1,299,164; for 1880 at $1,194,164; for 1881 at $1,093,164; for 1882 at $1,008,012, and for 1883, and each year succeeding to 1890, at $996,860; or, if averaged for the ten years, at $1,057,560 a year.[5] For the ensuing twenty years (at 4 per cent.) the annual interest would be $1,329,147; and for the remaining ten years under the bill (at 5 per cent.) it would be $1,661,333 a year. And this the funders are wont to call a 3 per cent. settlement—3, 4, and 5! The utter impossibility of meeting merely the average annual interest demand of even during the period of its lowest rate, need not be discussed, when it is apparent that, after defraying the necessary expenses of government, including support of the schools, no larger annual surplus can be safely relied on than $700,000; and when we are at once confronted, moreover, with an urgent floating debt of $2,552,372, which comprises $1,504,245 of school money diverted during former years, $60,482 of accrued interest on college endowments, $40,520 due the literary fund from fines diverted, $163,894 of outstanding warrants against the treasury, and $783,231 of over-due, self-executing, tax-receivable coupons.[6]

It was in the year 1866-'67 that the matter of Virginia's debt was first considered by the General Assembly. That was the first Legislature elected after the war, at a time when the partition of the State, the loss of population, the destruction of values, and the impoverished condition of our people were none of them properly realized. Yet that Assembly, strangely enough, before its constituencies had been consulted upon the subject, and when our circumstances were not understood, rashly and without due authority undertook to shoulder the entire old debt of undivided Virginia, with all its accumulations of overdue and unpaid interest that had accrued since the beginning of the war, and to capitalize the latter and interest upon that as additional principal.[7] Nay, so far from being authorized to assume this debt, the very constitution under which it acted (that of Alexandria) directed that the debt should be first "adjusted" with West Virginia.[8] The same body which so improperly assumed the debt and its accumulations also appointed a commission to negotiate for the return of West Virginia within our bounds and jurisdiction—so little did our representative men, our public leaders, then comprehend the real facts of our situation![9] Nor was it until after the complete failure of this effort to restore the integrity of our former limits that our politicians and our legislators began to understand and measure the permanent disruption of our territory as one of the numerous results of the war that too many were slow to see and to accept. The General Assembly, which so thoughtlessly and presumptuously began in 1866-'67 to treat this gave another instance of its helpless incapacity, when, after having unadvisedly and unauthoritatively assumed the entire debt of the old State and capitalized all interest in arrears, it actually levied a tax of only fourteen cents on the $100 of valuations in a divided and desolated State.[10] At a subsequent session, in 1866-'67, this same Legislature directed the auditor to pay only 4 per cent. on the old principal of the debt, and expressly forbade him to pay any interest upon the arrearages of interest which they had just authorized to be capitalized, though over eight millions of dollars ($8,227,286) had been funded under the act.[11] The inadequacy of so small a levy as fourteen cents but too plainly illustrates how little the representative men of the State in that day knew of her condition, and singularly proclaims the inconsiderateness with which they so hastily proceeded. The sequel proved that the levy was even insufficient for the support of government alone. Yet no efficient remedy was applied.

THE MAXIMUM OF PROMISE

was followed only by the minimum of performance. The same Assembly, at the following session, simply repudiated its own previous enactments. It then proceeded to effect the organization of the State government under the Alexandria constitution. Then came the acts of Congress remitting the State to the condition of a conquered province and to military rule, and thereby annihilating in effect the government and the legislation that had intervened. In this situation we remained until the 26th of January, 1870, when the State, with her government now reorganized under a new constitution, previously adopted, was recognized by the Federal authorities and formally

READMITTED TO THE UNION.

And here it is to be remembered that Virginia was rehabilitated as a State only on condition[12] that she adopted a new constitution acceptable to the Congress of the United States. The convention which framed the new constitution had not been a truly representative body, inasmuch as at the time of its selection probably the greater portion of our best informed citizens—the men most capable of dealing with our affairs—were disfranchised and ineligible to office. Hence there were many objectionable features in the instrument which the convention fabricated, principal among these being certain proscriptive provisions prescribing a rigorous test-oath, and other disfranchising and disabling stipulations. These, upon appeal to President Grant and his subsequent recommendation to Congress, had been submitted to a popular vote of our people; that is, the constitution was allowed to be voted for with or without the proscriptive clauses as the voter saw fit; and thus in the canvass of 1869 the engrossing topics of controversy, to the exclusion of almost everything else, were these clauses of proscription. The debt was never alluded to. The interest all concentrated upon the disfranchising sections, and so, when the constitution was at once expurgated and adopted at the election in July, 1869, the governor and Legislature that were chosen at the same time were wholly uninstructed as to the popular sentiment with respect to the public debt, about which no information and no opinion had been elicited. Yet it was this Legislature, under the special recommendation and urgency of this governor, that passed, on the last day of its session and under very suspicious circumstances, what is known as

THE FUNDING BILL.

The official recommendation upon which the passage of this bill was chiefly based assumed that our taxable values were $723,000,000.[1] Startling as it may appear, these values were soon ascertained to be but $336,686,433,[2] and this upon an assessment of reality which, compared with that of the other States, as ascertained by the Federal Government, exceeded the average by 47 per cent., and was 35 per cent. higher than the assessment of like property in the great States of New York and Pennsylvania.[3] This bill, beginning where that of 1866-'67 left off, capitalized all interest which had accrued in the interval, including interest upon that (in part already compounded) which had been previously capitalized, and it undertook to fix a principal debt of $45,000,000, of which two-thirds, or $30,000,000, was arbitrarily taken to be the part of this State, and the remainder deferred and certified to a settlement with West Virginia. This bill gave us the self-executing tax-receivable coupons, and provided that these should go with all the coupon bonds in which the $30,000,000 of so-recognized debt might be funded.[4] No sooner was the full magnitude of this debt disclosed and the character of its coupons understood than public opinion pronounced decidedly against it, not only as beyond our capacity, but as unjust in its exactions and degrading in its terms. Some of our most prominent and experienced men led the cry of disapproval; legislators who had voted for the measure changed their attitude toward it on fuller information; and at the next election a General Assembly was chosen so overwhelmingly against the bill that it was promptly repealed as to its tax-receivable-coupon features.[5] And here let it be observed that the people of Virginia were not derelict in proclaiming their

HOSTILITY TO THIS BILL.

It is seen that at once the real obligors in our public indebtedness—the voters and tax-payers of the Commonwealth—with a promptness that knew no delay and with an emphasis that gave no uncertain sound, declared their fixed and absolute intention to reject this measure and gave ample and timely notice to all concerned that they would not ratify a bargain about which they had not been consulted and in which their agents had acted without due authority. If this caveat, so filed, has been wantonly disregarded, it is not the fault of the sovereign obligors who have so fully disavowed the act which sought to bind them without their knowledge or consent. But in the mean time, and notwithstanding such notice, the creditors had eagerly availed themselves of the inviting advantages of the bill, and about twenty million dollars had been funded under it before the repealing act was adopted. The remaining $10,000,000 of the $30,000,000 of the so recognized debt, being still fundable, but without tax-coupons, was either so funded or so subsequently treated by the State—that portion so funded being known as the peeler, and the remainder as the unfunded debt. The $20,000,000 funded before the act of repeal is known as the consol debt. And here note that the funding bill of 1871, with all its pretensions to assuming and paying the whole debt of Virginia, began the funder record by repudiating one-third of what the so-called "debt-payers" estimated as the just principal of that debt; and that, while these "debt-payers" express a righteous horror of forcible readjustment and of any settlement not consented to by the creditor, they failed to ask this consent in their initial measure, and therein plainly denounced upon all our bondholders who should not agree to surrender $3 for $2, as provided in the bill, the severe penalty of entire incapacity to draw any interest from the State upon their claims. In short, the creditors were told in this funding bill of 1871, which is so often proclaimed as the palladium of that Virginia which would loudly condemn the employment of force against the creditors, nor make any provision for a settlement without their consent, that if they did not accede to its terms and fund thereunder they and their claims should not be recognized.[6] It is well to recall this when all the air around us is vocal with the proud protestations of these so-called "debt-payers" against forcible readjustment, as we thus find that even in their first step, as well as in their last, they did not hesitate to invoke force against the creditor in behalf of a scheme favored by themselves. And just here, in connection with this second unauthorized effort of a Virginia Legislature to assume and provide for the payment of a public debt for this State, recur for a moment to the Legislature of 1866-'67, which having no warrant for existence save that afforded by had no warrant to touch any alleged debt attached in any way to this Commonwealth except as directed by the Alexandria constitution. What did that instrument provide in this matter? The twenty-seventh section of article 4 declares:

HONOR AND HONESTY

THE ALEXANDRIA GOVERNMENT

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia respectively; and may authorize, in conjunction with the State of West Virginia, the sale of all lands and property of every description, including all stocks and other interests owned and held by the State of Virginia in banks, works of internal improvement and other companies at the time of the formation of the State of West Virginia; and no ordinance passed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June, 1861, adjusting the public debt between Virginia and West Virginia, shall be binding upon this State."

That covers the whole immediate authority over the subject vested in the General Assembly of 1866-'67, and it had no power to assume anything as to the debt or provide anything with respect to it, or even to adjust the relative proportions of the debt between the two States, except as especially empowered and instructed in the section quoted. No matter for how much the State might be liable in law or equity, the Alexandria constitution only authorized the Legislature of 1866-'67 to ascertain what was "proper to be borne" by Virginia, and prescribed the mode in which that should be done, namely, not by any separate action, but in conjunction "with West Virginia." That was the charter of the Legislature as to the debt, and whatever resulting powers might have followed the adjustment commanded, certainly it was not in order to do anything until that initial step was taken; and as that was not taken, it is sure that the action attempted in assuming and providing for any portion of the debt was premature and inconsiderate, if not unconstitutional, null, and void.

In like manner the Legislature which passed the funding bill of 1871, acting under a new constitution, which specifically and carefully limited the legislative discretion as to the debt of undivided Virginia, largely exceeded its powers when it sought to fix that debt at $45,000,000, therein capitalizing $15,000,000 of simple and compound interest which had accrued during the period of war and reconstruction, and attempting to apportion the shares which should be borne respectively by Virginia and West Virginia. That debt, under the constitution of 1869, as under that of Alexandria, was to await an as both these instruments, in accordance with common sense and common right, acknowledged that this State had no authority of her own independent motion to fix either the total of the debt or the part which is to be borne by either. Section 19 of article 10 of the constitution of 1869 prescribes:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the States of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State."

And thus it appears that in the first attempted assumption and funding of the alleged debt by the Legislature of 1866-'67, and also in the second attempt at assumption and funding by the Legislature of 1870-'71, both bodies not only acted without the instruction of their constituencies and without constitutional warrant, but in disregard of that essential adjustment directed by both instruments to be made with West Virginia, without which, either done or attempted in vain, all further or other proceedings were unauthorized and nugatory.

Under the joint operation of these two measures, (the funding bill of 1871 and the repealing act of 1872,) although there was $1,816,000 in the State treasury when the first of these was passed, it was soon found that the 'peeler creditors got little or no interest, while the consol creditors, with their only succeeded in realizing a portion of their interest by the sale of their coupons through brokers to speculators, who in their turn disposed of them to our larger tax-payers, who used them in payment of their dues to the Commonwealth. And thus through the interception of our revenues by these coupons, whereby a large portion of the annual levy for free schools was absorbed and the State deprived of means to fitly sustain her charitable institutions and her colleges, the consol creditors actually received but little over two-thirds of their interest, although the State practically paid the whole of it, the residue going in commissions to brokers, in profits to speculators, and in savings to our larger tax-payers. In effect, the consol creditor discovered that with all his advantages over the State and the 'peeler holders, he himself was also the victim of the spoilers, and that he was unable to realize more than 4 or 4½ of his 6 per cent., notwithstanding the fact that his coupons intercepted and diverted a large share of the tax imposed and set apart for public education—a tax imposed by the same Legislature which enacted the funding bill, in accordance with a constitutional injunction which requires that a tax on all property of at least ten cents on the one hundred dollars shall be levied for free schools, and under which the rate of taxation was raised from forty cents on the one hundred dollars of assessed values to fifty cents, especially to meet that specific requirement.[1] Meantime our net annual revenue, even under this increased levy, was only about $2,430,000, and our governmental expenses, including the constitutional apportionment to education, were never less than $1,600,000. It is easy to see that in this state of affairs, while our government was embarrassed, our

TAX-RECEIVABLE COUPONS

SCHOOLS ROBBED,

and our people dissatisfied, one-third at least of our creditors (the 'peeler bondholders,[2] who are now getting no interest) were almost in despair at the situation. Representatives of this class urged a readjustment of the debt; public sentiment demanded it, and our fast accumulating arrearages on almost every account made it a pressing necessity. The movement to that end was accordingly begun with vigor in 1873. The alternatives were readjustment or increase of taxation, and out of 140 members of the house of delegates of that year there were but 13 of the so-called "debt-payers" who would or did vote for an increase of tax; and when, four years later, a new accumulation of unpaid interest had gathered to the amount of $5,000,000, the schools had been deprived of their dues to an aggregate of $1,500,000, and it was necessary to negotiate loans from the banks to run the government and maintain our eleemosynary institutions, there were but four of the

SO-CALLED DEBT-PAYERS

in that House who would vote to raise the rate of taxation.[3] The 'peeler holders were still to receive no interest; and the schools, which had begun to flourish under the minimum tax in their behalf of ten cents on the $100, eked out by a poll-tax of one dollar on all male citizens over twenty-one years of age, despoiled to a greater and greater extent each succeeding year by the tax-coupons, declined in numbers and in length of session until one-half of them were closed altogether and the other half were kept open only two or three months in the year. The educational system which had in its first years been our pride and boast, and under which so many thousands of our poor children of both colors were receiving at least the rudiments of learning, fell into rapid decay under this fatal depletion of its resources, and they who had been the chief authors of its misfortunes became the principal complainants against the decadence and inefficiency which they themselves had caused. The people, however, whose children had been benefited by the schools, and who themselves had acquiesced in the increase of the rate of taxation from forty to fifty cents for the purpose of securing for their children the blessings of education, began to clamor for the proper application of the tax and to bitterly denounce those who were responsible for its diversion, either as principals or as accessories.

At this juncture (in 1877) the period had arrived for the election of State officers and a General Assembly. If there were any who favored an increase of taxes, none were bold enough to declare it, unless we except one candidate for the house of delegates.[4] The conservative party (comprising the mass of the white voters and controlling the State) met in State convention, and formally declared that taxes could not be increased, and that the public debt must be readjusted within the compass of the revenue derived from the (then) existing rate of taxation, and without discrimination against any class of the creditors.[5] Upon this nominations of governor and other State officers were made and accepted, and upon it they were elected. The nominee for governor, previous to his nomination, in a letter which was published in his interests, declared his readiness to abide by the will of the people in the matter of the debt, and that it was a subject to be disposed of by the Legislature, and not by the executive.[1] In his letter accepting the nomination he declared that the debt issue was before the people, and that they should and would have special reference to its disposition in their choice of legislators. In point of fact, while he made no canvass before the people for his election as governor, the debt was the all-important question in every city and county of the Commonwealth as to members of the General Assembly, and the result was the return to both branches of the Legislature of a large majority of members instructed and our public obligations strictly within our income, as derived from the rate of fifty cents on the $100, after providing for the necessary support of government, the due maintenance of our charitable asylums, and awarding to the free schools the dues apportioned them by the constitution. In his inaugural address[2] the new governor testified that the debt had been the only issue of the legislative campaign and that it was for the legislators to settle it in accordance with the instructions from their constituents.

Accordingly that General Assembly, fresh from the people, and chosen on the sole issue of the debt, did at once prepare and pass the so-called which, after reciting the inability of the people to bear heavier impositions and declaring the inadequacy of the revenue to meet the expenses of government, support the schools, and pay the interest on the public debt at the rate per cent. and the principal claimed under the funding bill, proceeded to levy and apportion the taxes in the proportion of twenty-five cents for government, ten cents for schools, and fifteen cents for interest. This was no measure of readjustment, but merely an appropriation bill for one year. The temporary purpose was to evade the tax-coupons and "to relieve the present financial embarrassments of the State;" but should it stand the test of the courts its final purpose was "to secure an adjustment of the public debt with the consent of the creditors, if practicable, and without discriminating between them upon fair and equitable principles." It was at all events a measure well calculated to bring to just determination the declaration which it made, that "the preservation of the State government is absolutely necessary not only for the protection of the person and property of the citizen of the Commonwealth, but for the preservation of the rights and promotion of the interests of the creditor of the Commonwealth." But the governor vetoed it, notwithstanding his committals expressed and implied to the contrary.[3] Then followed

THE BOCOCK-FOWLER BILL, which proposed to settle with the creditors on the basis of the debt as claimed under the funding bill, with interest at 3 per cent. for eighteen years, and at 4 per cent. for thirty-two years—an average of 3⅝ per cent. This bill was approved by the governor and became a law; but it fell still-born, not a dollar being funded under it, and I refer to it only to show how inevitably the schemes approved by the self-styled "debt-payers" have fallen short of that observance of the inviolable sanctity of contracts of which they prate so much.[4] At the next session of this Legislature the whole business was reopened. It was then that appeared upon the scene with his staff of agents and attorneys. He tendered his services to effect a settlement with the creditors, and his bill for this purpose, (which he brought with him from New York already printed,) like the conservative platform of 1877 and all the bills of settlement proposed since the funding bill of 1871, embodied the accepted proposition of all parties that the industrial and productive interests of Virginia could not stand any increase of taxation and that this must be acknowledged in any scheme of final adjustment.[5] The representative of two syndicates, one of New York and the other of London, and frankly confessing that he did not speak for our creditors, Mr. McCulloch proposed that if the exclusive privilege and supreme power of refunding the debt were conveyed to his syndicates they would use their best exertions to bring the creditors to terms.[6] His bill, in form and purport, was an irrepealable contract between Virginia and these associations of brokers, by and through whom alone the funding was to proceed.[7] The accumulation of interest upon the 'peeler and unfunded bonds, (which in all the eight years from the passage of the funding bill had received but 12 per cent.,) now aggregating $5,000,000, was to be capitalized at 50 cents on the dollar.[8]

The old bonds were to be refunded at par in the proportion of two dollars in consols to one in 'peelers; and the new bonds were to run for forty years at 3 per cent. interest for the first ten years, 4 per cent. for the next twenty years, and 5 per cent. for the remaining ten years, with tax-receivable coupons, and principal and interest to be exempt forever from all taxation within the State.[9] Under the former bills there had been no such exemption, and the coupons had been subjected to a tax which was deducted from them whenever they were presented in payment of public dues. It also converted the whole of the debt, principal and interest, from one payable in currency to one payable in gold,[10] or sterling at London, at the option of the creditor. A further provision was that if at any one of the semi-annual periods for the payment of interest there should not be money in the treasury for that purpose it should be borrowed, or there should be issued certificates for sums of $1 and its multiples, receivable for all taxes, to be hypothecated or sold at not less than seventy-five cents on the dollar.[11] The funding was to proceed by installments, not less than $8,000,000 by the 1st of January, 1880, and of not less than $5,000,000 within each succeeding six months. Such were the main features of the measure as it was perfected and came from the syndicates. That this was

was obvious upon its face, and it was soon developed that the 'peeler creditors were to be atrociously victimized. These, as has been said, had received only the equivalent of two years' interest in eight years, and on each of their one-hundred-dollar bonds there was overdue and unpaid $36 in interest. This portion of the debt was chiefly held by guardians and other fiduciaries under a provision of our code requiring them to so invest their trust funds, and the nature of their securities had not as a general thing been changed under any of the previous bills. This bill authorized fiduciaries to invest their funds under it without the usual interposition of any court. But mark how the 'peeler holder was placed at the mercy of the syndicate. Anxious to exchange his helpless bonds for the better ones provided by this bill, he naturally applied to the financial officers of the State to have it done. These at once informed him (or her) that they had nothing to do with it except as directed and required by Mr. McCulloch's agent, through whose office all the funding must be transacted. Calling on this agent, he was there informed that his 'peeler bonds could not be funded unless accompanied by consol bonds in the proportion of $2 in consols to one in 'peelers. Not having the consols, nor the means or authority to purchase them, the 'peeler holder had no recourse but to hold on to his barren bonds or to sell them. But who would buy bonds so unproductive and which had been put at such disadvantage by the McCulloch bill? Mr. McCulloch's agent! He would relieve the 'peeler holder of his unmarketable bonds, and for every $100 of principal, having upon it accrued and unpaid interest amounting to $36, fundable at fifty cents in the dollar, (making a new capital of $118,) the agent of the syndicates offered only $24, or $96 less than the fundable value of the security!

It was monstrous, to be sure; but what remedy had the 'peeler holder against these brokers into whose hands the State had delivered him; into whose keeping had been confided the honor and honesty of the public faith? He had to submit and take what they offered him, or hold on to bonds that were worthless in his hands, and for which otherwise the bill made no manner of provision. The McCulloch syndicates, meantime, looking forward to this speculation, had taken advantage of the depression of consol bonds in the market, consequent on the result of our State election of 1877, and had provided themselves with a supply of these bonds to enable them to proceed in their scheme. They had also provided in their bill that in making up the first installment of eight millions to be funded by the 1st of January, 1880, the accrued interest to be capitalized at fifty cents in the dollar, might be employed as 'peeler principal,[1] and as the coupons representing this interest were not receivable for taxes and were six years in arrears, the syndicates purchased a large amount of them for their purposes at seven to ten cents in the dollar. They actually did make up their first installment of eight millions by using this 'peeler interest to the amount of about one million dollars.

In looking at this process, with respect to the holder of the 'peeler bonds, the question naturally arises that if he were not an unwilling what is meant by force in this connection? He was certainly no voluntary party to the arrangement which excluded him from a fair participation in the funding, which repudiated absolutely one-half of his interest, and which gave the syndicates such complete mastery of his bonds. His consent was not sought, although he was as meritorious as any other of the creditors of the State, his bonds resting in the faith of the same people, being part of the same debt, and calling for the same rate of interest as the "consols." But he was marked as McCulloch's game; and when he was forced to accept $24 from the syndicates for his bond and accrued interest, fundable at $118, the syndicates funded the same and sold the new bonds at market rates for $59.40, thereby realizing a profit of $35.40 on an investment of $24. It is easy to see that by a like process with the whole ten million of the 'peeler debt the syndicates could have netted $3,500,000 on that alone, without reckoning their commissions and profits from other sources in this funding job, of which they had the complete monopoly, without restriction as to per cent. They were in no sense the agents of the State; in effect, the assignees. The bill was not only forcible in the hands of the syndicates as against the 'peeler creditors, but also as against the consol creditors and the State herself. The force here was principally provided in heretofore alluded to, whose issue was compulsory in default of money in the treasury to meet any payment of accrued interest under the bill; and as interest was payable every six months, with default assured in advance at every such period, these certificates, to be sold at seventy-five cents in the dollar, were issuable semi-annually and redeemable every six months,[3] thus subjecting the State, as long as the process was possible, to an exaction of 5½ per cent. per month, or 66⅔ per cent. per annum, to raise means to pay 3 per cent. interest upon the bonds issued under the bill. How much better and more direct, how much more compatible with honesty and fair-dealing with the tax-payers, who at last would bear the burden of the extortion, it were to raise the rate of taxation, the necessity for which this ruinous provision confesses!

VICTIM OF FORCE

And just here we might inquire how long it would take by this process to destroy the vitals of a State, long since in the throes of bankruptcy, and unable to make buckle and tongue meet, by a deficiency reaching nigh upon one million of dollars annually? But as a measure of forcible persuasion and speculation they were needed. For it is to be observed that for the purpose of coercing the consol creditor, who relied upon the sale of his tax coupons in the market, and for the further purpose of speculating in the certificates themselves, the syndicates would take these tax certificates at seventy-five cents on the dollar in payment of their interest; and thus equipped they were well able to compete with the tax coupons, as their tax certificates were equally valuable in payment of taxes and other dues to the State, and as the syndicate could not only afford to sell them at seventy-five cents on the dollar, but at any lower rate that might be necessary to drive the consol-holders to accept the bill and the terms the syndicate choose to offer. At seventy-five cents, however, they brought the value of the consol coupon, already reduced to 4½ per cent., down to 3, the lowest rate borne by the McCulloch bonds. This the funders (or "debt-payers") and brokers designated as a feature of "persuasion;" but it is evident enough that it answered all the purposes of force and that it was designed to compel the consol creditor to yield to the syndicates. While, therefore, the 'peeler creditor was horribly outraged by this bill, it no less certainly, though in less degree and in a less direct manner, was fully prepared to command the submission of the consol-creditor or to sacrifice him.

It is to be noted, too, that while the consol creditor only got a portion of his tax coupon, after paying commissions to brokers to sell it at a depreciated rate, his bond was subject to taxes, which further diminished his net percentage and reduced the value of his bond; whereas the McCulloch bonds were exempt from all taxation and were armed with the power to compel the payment of their full demand for interest by the issue of the tax-receivable certificates. It was not to be doubted that a measure possessing so many objectionable features as the McCulloch bill would encounter strenuous opposition before the people; and accordingly the readjusters organized to defeat it, making an active canvass to elect a Legislature pledged to its repeal and to a that should fully respond to the demands of the situation. Hereupon the debt-payers, resuming their conservative guise, called a meeting of the conservative State committee, where only fifteen of the twenty-seven members appeared, twelve of these being funders and three readjusters. Against the protest of the three readjuster committeemen, these twelve (commonly known as the "rump") proceeded, in effect, to overrule the convention of 1877 and make the McCulloch bill the platform of the party, assuming to excommunicate all who declined to support that measure.

It is unnecessary to go into details of the warm canvass that ensued. Suffice it to say that against all the odds of equipment and munition the readjusters, to the dismay and astonishment of the funders, carried the State by a majority of over 20,000 votes, of which over 15,000 was white majority. In the senate were chosen 23 readjusters to 17 funders, and in the house were elected 57 readjusters to 43 funders. A majority of the legislators-elect, of both the republican and the conservative parties, were strongly opposed to the McCulloch bill. These, co-operating as readjusters, elected all the capitol officers and county judges, I myself being over Colonel Withers by a joint conservative white majority, exclusive of all colored and republican votes, of 7, of which 3 were in the house and 4 in the senate—my total joint readjuster vote being 80, to 60 cast for Colonel Withers and all others.

CHOSEN UNITED STATES SENATOR

And here I beg to say that this reference to myself seems necessary; for, while I was never candidate of my own motion for the Senate of the United States, no sooner was the separate and independent action of the readjusters entered upon than the movement was denounced by the Bourbon-funder democracy as one aimed to carry me to the Senate. In point of fact, Bourbonism and its twin funderism had forced the movement, not only as necessary to compel a final settlement of the debt, but to save the free schools, defend the right of suffrage, rid the State from the reign of Bourbon-funderism, and free the people, all the people, from the domination of a political clique, as prejudiced and illiberal in its opinions as it was insolent and overbearing in its acts. But in hope to discredit, injure, and defeat the movement and its objects by ascribing to it a mere motive of personal ambition, I was selected as the sacrifice, and all the vials of Bourbon wrath and aspersion were poured out upon me. Thus my nomination in the first instance was the work of the Bourbons. The people accepted the nomination; made it one of the issues, and a Legislature was chosen which triumphantly elected me. The Bourbon cry during the canvass was, "Anything and anybody to beat MAHONE!" and had the readjusters been defeated, several gentlemen would have seriously contested Senator Withers' claim to renomination and re-election; but, as it was, they all gracefully deferred to him, and allowed him the honor of certain defeat!

The developments that at once ensued demonstrated how egregiously in error the funders had been in their calculations. They had promised not only a sufficiency of revenue to carry their bill and all expenses of government, including support of the schools, but a large surplus. On the 1st of January, 1880, when the readjuster State officers came into power, instead of the surplus of $525,600 so confidently promised,[1] after defraying the current expenses of the government, including the proper charge for schools and the payment of interest, it was actually discovered that a plate had been prepared with a proof impression in the auditor's office[2] for the issue of tax certificates, to be sold at seventy-five cents on the dollar, to pay the first interest demand of this new funding scheme. In the treasury there was only $22,494, and against this was an alarming and pressing floating debt amounting to a total of $2,552,372, consisting of $1,504,245 of intercepted and diverted school taxes, $60,482 due colleges, $40,520 of misappropriated funds due the literary fund, $163,894 in warrants outstanding against the treasury and $783,231 in tax-receivable coupons overdue and unpaid.[3] Among the first acts of the readjuster Legislature was one to authorize the borrowing of $200,000 for the relief and maintenance of the lunatic asylums, which for months past had been poorly served as best the officials could obtain supplies upon credit. In this signal manner had the estimates of the funders miscarried, while the better founded calculations of the readjusters were amply verified.

With only the first installment of $8,000,000 funded under it, the McCulloch bill had been so severely condemned by the people that the syndicate abandoned it, having already, however, profited largely by the gross appliances of extortion provided for them in that measure.[4] They held the contract to refund our debt at their own option, the State and her creditors being rigidly bound to the syndicate as long as these chose; but the syndicate were bound only at their own sweet will and pleasure.[5]

READJUSTER REFORM.

In taking possession so far of the government of Virginia, which had so long been administered by the funders or so-called debt-payers, the readjusters not only found an empty treasury beleaguered by immediate claims amounting to two and a half millions of dollars, all clamorous for payment; not only surprised the auditor's office in the very act of issuing tax certificates to be sold at seventy-five cents in the dollar to raise money at 66⅔ per cent. a year to pay 3 per cent. on the McCulloch bill; not only found that eight years of debt-paying talk and funder control had not only failed to pay the debt of 1871, but had actually allowed arrearage to accumulate to about nine millions of dollars, when you include interest due the sinking fund and the $1,816,000 with which they began to run the government; not only found our asylums and colleges embarrassed for lack of due support from the State, and our whole free-school system paralyzed by an unfriendly and illegal conversion of its funds to the sum of over one million and a half to other uses, but chaos and mismanagement, not to say fraud and corruption, were discovered to have reigned throughout almost every department of the administration.

In the accounts of the penitentiary it was at once developed that the agent and storekeeper had defalcated to about $35,000;[6] in the office of the auditor of public accounts the public business was all behindhand; county treasurers and other collectors in arrears for an aggregate running through several years of over $400,000; illegal and extortionate charges on criminal account had been improperly paid in large sums to city sergeants and others; and by indulgence, favoritism, procrastination, and negligence our revenues had fallen into wretched disorder. In the second auditor's office bonds refunded, or that had never been legally issued, were missing, and coupons that had been received for taxes (some of them uncanceled) were gone, and a legislative committee of investigation, with a long search still before it, has already found that bonds and coupons have disappeared to a sum exceeding one hundred thousand dollars; and on almost every hand inefficiency, if not peculation, was exposed. The party of reform and of the people, the readjusters, at once set about the improvement of State affairs.

The frauds on the treasury were stopped and legal process appealed to for reimbursement from former offenders, or for their criminal punishment; defaulting and delinquent collectors of the revenue were no longer indulged, and the necessary steps were taken to compel prompt settlement for the future and to recover the unpaid deficiencies of the past; a new vigor and a fresh vigilance were brought into every division of the public service; the voter and the litigant, as far as the readjusters were responsible for the execution of the laws, found fairness and impartiality at the polls and in the courts; the schools were revived, for not only were their current dues awarded them, but large payments were made on the arrears improperly kept from them; the penitentiary, which, under funder rule, had cost the State annually a sum scarcely ever less than $60,000, has now already become practically self-supporting, and, under readjuster management, will soon yield a handsome income to the Commonwealth; and in every department where the readjusters have gained control, our affairs even in this brief interval are exhibiting marked improvement. Yet it is not alone in the important details of practical government that the readjusters have wrought great and beneficial changes. Public sentiment itself has been enlightened and liberalized by the movement. Bourbonism has lost its grip on our politics. Our people,

WEARIED AND EXHAUSTED

by the hard service exacted of them under the unremunerative despotism of prejudice and passion, are opening their eyes and discarding the blind leaders that have led them into so many ditches of disappointment and disaster, and are anxious to end the strife of sections by every proper and reasonable concession that may contribute to the full restoration of national harmony and good will and that may afford them opportunities of fairly sharing in the material prosperity of the country. But it was with the debt that the readjusters were chiefly expected to deal, and they at once showed that they were equal to the occasion. Taught by the long series of failures made by the funders, the readjusters had learned that whatever spirit of repudiation existed in this State had been fostered by the reckless methods of "debt paying," that only made a mockery of promise and a farce of performance. Too often seduced by these nominal "debt-payers" into schemes utterly beyond their ability, and impossible of execution, people began to grow familiar with default or irritated by postponements that but increased the debt or complicated its condition, while our capacity to pay seemed perpetually to become less and less. It was thus, by extravagant undertakings with regard to our obligations, that some began to view these obligations, not as claims to be paid according to our resources, but as topics for "high rhetoric," and for that Micawber policy which readily gives its bond on no better security than what the chances of the future may "turn up." When this species of trifling, which inevitably tended to create a public sentiment careless of payment, where only promises to pay were required, and which as surely pointed to repudiation as an eventual result, the readjusters would have nothing to do except to condemn and oppose it. Recognizing the fact that the people of Virginia nevertheless are but are honestly eager to provide for the payment of every dollar of the principal of their just indebtedness and of interest to the full extent of their ability, the first inquiry of the readjusters (never before properly instituted) was: What is our debt? and what the utmost stretch of our annual revenues for the payment of interest? These inquiries, so natural and so necessary in the case of all debtors, was more than ordinarily pressing in the case of Virginia, confronted by a demand dating from 1861, when the present State of West Virginia was included in our territory, and running through years of war and of military occupation and government, and when the debt had now been woefully confused and worse confounded by the several abortive and wretched efforts at settlement which had been instituted by the honorable "debt-payers," brokers, and missionary syndicates. Going back to 1861 we find that the debt of Virginia at that date was $31,160,000,[1] and taking that as a basis, the readjusters, without abating it one dollar, have assumed that two-thirds of that sum is the just measure of the proportion of the original principal for which this Commonwealth is legally, justly, and equitably liable; and in thus apportioning the debt as it stood when West Virginia was a part of this State they have acted because West Virginia has declined in effect to co-operate with this State in determining their respective proper portions of the joint obligations, because even the funding bill and the McCulloch bill so adjusted the relative liabilities of the two States, because one-third of the territory comprised in this State at the creation of the debt went to the formation of West Virginia, and because it is an established doctrine in public debts, with exceptions arising only from the nature or necessity of particular cases or from positive stipulations, that they follow the land, and that the just measure of the rate of interest upon them are the products of the land.

The principal on this basis once determined brought them to the consideration of the question of interest, and guided only by the utmost realiable surplus, after maintaining the government and schools, to be derived from a rate of taxation, admitted to be the highest that can be borne, it was seen, as I have demonstrated, to be 3 per cent. The creditor takes the obligation of the sovereign, subject to the exigencies of public policy as much as though nominated in the bond.

THE RIDDLEBERGER BILL

on this basis and upon these principles proceeds by legal methods to enforce equity between the State and the creditors and between all classes of the creditors. It makes the principal, in round figures, twenty millions, interest 3 per cent., both payable in currency. It refuses to violate the express terms of the constitution of the State by exempting this class of property from the common burden.[2] It rests the whole obligation upon the good faith of the people, the highest pledge a sovereign State can offer and ought to give. Had this bill, passed by the Legislature, been approved by the governor it was to have been submitted to the people for ratification, so that it should lack no sanction to give it validity and finality. But the governor vetoed the measure, and it fell temporarily. Yet it embodies, as the readjusters believe, the will and wishes of our people as to the debt, and is the only practical scheme of readjustment which deals equitably with all the creditors, rescues them from the clutch of the brokers, and insures the integrity of the obligation, the regular payment of interest, the proper value of the security, and the hearty recognition of the obligor. "It is to the property of the citizen and not to the demand of the creditor of the State that the original faith of society is pledged. The claim of the citizen is prior in time, paramount in title, superior in equity." So believing, the readjusters stand firmly by the Riddleberger bill and expect to make it the successful solution of this vexed question.

In fixing the principal debt of Virginia at $19,665,176, it is obvious that about $13,600,000 of the principal which the McCulloch bill sought to fasten upon us has been eliminated; but it is equally obvious that no such principal as $33,256,000 can be justly claimed against this State. How, then, is that enormous amount (greater than the whole debt of undivided Virginia) made up? By which accrued during the period of war and reconstruction. We not only object to this usurious and oppressive mode of accumulation against us, but we peremptorily reject the whole claim for any interest at all for the period indicated. We might rest our right to do this simply upon the plea of necessity—the public exigency; that war and the quasi condition of war under the military rule actually deprived us of all ability to meet the interest; that our present circumstances imperatively demand the abatement. Besides, we made tender within our ability. The greater portion of our interest was payable in Richmond, and we offered to pay that in Virginia treasury notes (always at premium over confederate money), but they were refused, although our soldiers were paid off in such, or inferior money, and impressed supplies for the army and government were paid for in the same funds. The interest on that portion of the debt held abroad was also tendered in tobacco and cotton to the British and Austrian consuls at Richmond, but on consultation with their ministers at Washington it was declined, lest it might be considered offensive by the Federal Government, although the British Government had recognized the belligerent rights of the confederacy.[3]

I shall not attempt to cite in detail the legal authorities and precedents with regard to the suspension and abatement of interest during war, although the principle was asserted and maintained in Virginia and other States as to interest during our revolutionary war on claims held against citizens of the States. Thomas Jefferson, Judge Pendleton of Virginia, and others,[4] might be quoted with respect to the matter; and if the interest did not run against the private party, because he could not make profit during war with which to pay it, and was prevented by the condition of war from reaching his creditor to pay him, even had he been realizing an income sufficient for that purpose, a fortiori it did not run against Virginia, a State of the Union at war with other States and the Federal Government, beleaguered and blockaded both by land and sea, and desolated throughout her borders by especially when she made tender of payment, to the best of her ability, and was refused. Equity at least, if not law, must sustain her claim to be relieved of this exaction under all the circumstances; and when it is seen and admitted that it is positively beyond her ability, the matter is concluded. Heretofore, having a net revenue averaging only $2,430,000 annually,[1] the recent reassessment of real property in Virginia (as commanded to be done every five years by the constitution) has resulted in a decrease of valuations of not less than 20 per cent., and we cannot for the future safely count upon a net yearly income greater than $2,100,000.[2] To put our annual expenses of government at $900,000 is a figure only possible through the strictest economy and without any allowance for extraordinary contingencies that may arise at any moment.[3]

FIRE AND SWORD,

The constitutional apportionment to the free schools will require $500,000 a year, varying in accordance with the receipts from the poll tax, (which were larger when its payment was not required to exercise the right of suffrage.)[4] We thus have $1,400,000 of current liability for expenses of government and schools that must be met, and this leaves only $700,000 of the $2,100,000 of net annual revenue to be applied to the debt. This will pay 3 per cent. on $20,000,000 and leave a surplus of $100,000; but we have at once a pressing floating debt of $2,552,000 to extinguish, and if we should apply the whole surplus to this end it would take us twenty-five years to extinguish it. Of this $2,552,000 of floating debt $783,000 is in tax-receivable coupons, past due, that may be used to intercept and practically decrease our revenues. With our credit re-established there can be no difficulty in bridging over this immediate demand. But our affairs will improve, no doubt; yet as our resources may expand, so will our needs grow. Already we need a new capitol and various other public buildings. Our asylums are inadequate, and many of our insane, white and colored, are confined in our county jails.[5]

And we must not let hope in the future mislead us in this grave matter. We are much worse off to-day, financially, than we were in 1871, when we passed the funding bill. The assessment just completed of our real estate is to stand for five years, and within that period at any rate we can count safely only on a revenue of $2,100,000 net for all purposes.

TAXES CANNOT BE INCREASED.

Even the Bourbon-funders, so-called "debt-payers," have admitted that by word and deed. Nothing is more evident than that their duty immediately on the passage of the funding bill was to levy a tax sufficient to meet its requirements, if they honestly meant that measure as a settlement. Then and every day since, if their professions of "debt-paying" were not empty boasts, their first and only duty in this regard was to raise the rate of taxation to the necessary height. But this they have invariably declined to do. This, indeed, they have always voted against—no matter their pretensions for the observance of obligations they would proclaim sacred and inviolable. Sacred or not, it is apparent that we have but $700,000 a year to meet our annual liability for interest. For, differ as they do radically about many things, both funders and readjusters agree that taxes cannot be increased. All our debt bills and all our platforms, coming from either side, proclaim the same conclusion as to this. We believe $19,665,176 to be the just and equitable measure of our public debt, and 3 per cent. thereon the limit of our ability, as well as a fair rate of interest; we propose to settle at these figures as a final disposition of a matter which is kept in controversy, to the injury of the State and her creditors and only to the benefit of brokers and philanthropic syndicates. As I have heretofore said, if the inviolability of contracts is to be insisted on, and if this Virginia is to be held to the liability incurred by the Virginia of 1860-'61, then from these was committed in the funding bill of 1871, which repudiated one-third of the debt by referring it to West Virginia, and which refused all interest to creditors who declined to accept that bill and surrender $3 for $2. The McCulloch bill itself goes still further when it positively repudiates one-third of the old debt, repudiates one-half of the whole arrearage of interest on the 'peeler and unfunded debt, while full interest has been paid upon the consol; and, instead of adhering to the original agreement for 6 per cent., proposes to pay only 3, 4, and 5 per cent. And in the last session of the General Assembly the Bourbon-funder "debt-payers" surrendered everything—the irrepealability of contracts and the inviolability of contracts—when, after having already passed the Bocock-Fowler bill, and the McCulloch bill, and the funding bill, all impairing the obligation of the contract of 1860-'61, and each in derogation, violation, and repeal of its predecessors, they united in voting for the Ross-Hamilton substitute, which offered a uniform interest of 3 per cent.[6] Thus all parties have recognized the right and necessity for some departure from the original terms of a bargain which has never had the approval of the people; which we cannot execute. And, that confessed, then the limits of the departure are only to be determined by the necessity which authorizes and the equities which demand it. These limits, by careful methods, are found and fixed in the Riddleberger bill, where, recognizing every dollar of our just indebtedness, we undertake a rate of interest as great as our revenues and ability warrant. It is a simple sum of figures, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.

There is much more that might be said, but I forbear to trespass further upon your indulgence. We are anxious to determine and settle the debt, and we shall be happy if the liberal and generous impulses of the northern people shall lead them to aid us by their countenance and sympathy to a consummation so devoutly to be wished. We are not repudiators. We acknowledge every dollar that we believe we justly owe, and we intend to pay it; and if we ask an abatement in the rate of interest, it is our poverty, not our will, consents. Our case is hard, indeed. We cannot pay the debt as claimed against us. No one in Virginia will any longer pretend that we can. He is honest who engages to pay no more than he has means to pay with. He is not honest who promises with the knowledge of inability to perform. Nor can we allow the matter to stand as it is, to run against us, without exposing ourselves to the shame of actual and

COMPULSORY REPUDIATION.

The case of the creditors is not much better. Many of them are receiving no interest at all, and a large proportion of them under debt-paying auspices have received only two years' interest in eight years. The bonds of a great portion of the debt can only be sold at an immense sacrifice to the holders, and none of the bonds have any stable value or afford the holder the interest which they promise. Meantime State and creditor are unhappy. Both, too, are losing by delay and by the futile plans of adjustment that do not respond to the demands of the situation, or that are fashioned only in the interests of the brokers. These last—the brokers—are the only ones who make profit out of our unsettled finances; these gentry impartially victimizing both Virginia and her creditors, and, finding equal opportunity of speculation whether bonds rise or fall, are happy in either event and care little who may be their victims. Any final settlement would be objectionable to these jobbers in the necessities and misfortunes of the State and individuals, and no scheme that will effect such a settlement can hope for their approval. And with the readjustment of the debt as proposed, the readjusters come into full control of the Commonwealth, remove from place and power, and start Virginia on a new career of progress, prosperity, and greatness. Free suffrage for all men; a fair count at the polls; free education for all children, and an impartial administration of the constitution and the laws for all citizens, will be the internal policy of the liberal party which shall have dethroned the Bourbons; and with respect to the nation and our sister States, the same liberal party will insist upon and inculcate honest submission to the results of the war; due observance of the constitutional amendments, the reconstruction acts, and all the other expressed and implied conditions that accompanied the restoration of Virginia to the Union; the cultivation of fraternal relations with our fellow-citizens of every quarter, and the removal of sectional jealousies and race distinctions in all our politics.[1]

THE BOURBON REACTIONISTS

I now also want to challenge my colleague or Senators in sympathy with him to controvert by proof one single statement of facts or figures which that paper contains. My colleague lately laid a paper before the public on this subject so full of errors that few of the organs of his own party in Virginia dared to publish it, and some of these had to apologize or explain its mistakes, not the least of which was a neglect to draw the distinction between gross and net revenues, when it is notorious that the insolvent capitation and property tax and cost of collection is equal to 17 per cent. of the whole levy. A proper regard for the time of Senators who cannot feel any great interest in this domestic affair forbids that I should treat this subject further.

Mr. President, I shall now ask the attention of Senators to a matter that I conceive is of more concern to them than what I have been discussing. In the report of the proceedings of Friday I find the following inquiry, propounded by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN:]

I will ask one now, whether he would put his name, with all the patronage of Illinois at his command, on the back of the papers of an applicant for the smallest post-office in his State who said that he was not in favor of paying the national debt or the debt of Illinois or any part thereof—not as a thing of yesterday, but now, for I do not understand that Mr. Riddleberger has changed his views as they were laid down, not on a dead issue as to the war, but on a living issue, as was boasted in the presence of this Senate by the leader with whom the other side have made their coalition.

Mr. President, I might ask the distinguished Senator how he finds it compatible with the sentiment injected in this inquiry to associate with gentlemen on his side of the Chamber; how he finds it compatible to take the hand of gentlemen who represent States on this floor that have not repudiated. Oh, no; they have not repudiated, but they have readjusted! I do not know, sir, what authority this interrogative statement is based upon. I do know, sir, that it is without foundation, both in its reference to the State and the national debt. I have spoken from the stand with Mr. Riddleberger more than once, and I have never heard him even express his approval of the views of the Senator from Indiana on the national debt. On the contrary, one of the leaders of the opposition in Virginia long since promulgated opinions on the national debt which entered largely into our campaign. It was carried upon the hustings by Mr. Riddleberger, and always criticised in a manner that could leave no doubt of his position. The document covers some ten or more columns of a newspaper and is too long to read, but it is briefly summarized in this conclusion, which I shall read; and this comes from one of the distinguished leaders of the party to which my colleague belongs. Says that distinguished gentleman, in treating of this grave and great financial problem of the country:

REMEDIES PROPOSED.

6. I have endeavored to diagnose the disease. What remedies shall he apply to it? I would say—

First, abolish national banks; second, abolish the tax on and revive the State banks; third, substitute Treasury notes for national-bank notes; fourth, make them receivable for custom duties, as well as all debts, public and private; fifth, stop the sale of bonds for redemption purposes, and repeal the redemption act——

Mr. CONKLING. Who says that?

Mr. MAHONE. One of the most distinguished leaders of the party to which my colleague belongs.

Mr. CONKLING. We have not heard his name; we do not know whom the Senator means.

Mr. MAHONE. Out of that consideration which governs me not to introduce, as by the example of my colleague I might, the names of distinguished gentlemen, I have forborne; but if he wants the name, he shall have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Name him.

Mr. MAHONE. Major John W. Daniel.

and, sixth, pay off all United States bonds in paper which were contracted to be so paid to maintain State credit.

We shall thus be relieved of a great portion of taxes; money will flow into the dry channels of business; our paper, by being made to perform all the paying functions of silver and gold, will be preserved near par; our State, empowered to establish banks, will have control of its finances; and hope will come to a people bordering on despair. The iniquitous measures of Federal finance have brought Virginia to the verge of repudiation.

Reverse them, and the enhanced values of our productions will enable us to pay interest on our debt. Give the bondholder his due. He has no right to demand more. Give the people their due. They demand it, and will be content with no less. Thus fairly and squarely duty will be done, and while preserving against monopoly and aggrandizement and tyrannous power the rights of American freemen, we shall be enabled to preserve also untarnished that sacred and precious legacy which our fathers bequeathed us and which our brave comrades defended.

"THE HONOR AND FAIR FAME OF VIRGINIA."

[1] See the readjuster platform of February, 1879, and that of July, 1880.

These are the views of one of the leaders of the Funder-Bourbon party in Virginia, and the gentleman named by my colleague as their candidate for governor. I do not suppose the Senator will call them repudiation doctrines, although I am not sufficiently acquainted with the narrow distinctions between the "Indiana notion" and the "Ohio idea" to say with which this accords. I shall leave to the Senator, who I am told can make the waters of the Wabash flow backward by the power of his invincible phrases, to enlighten the Senate on this point when Federal affairs shall again be subject for consideration instead of Virginia readjustment. [Laughter.]

It may not be amiss, however, to suggest to the Senator that he avail himself of the first caucus opportunity for a conference with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and thus readjust the differences which seem to exist between the democracy East and West on gold and greenbacks, so that hereafter the party may have defined principles upon which to plant itself before the country. It might be well also to readjust all differences in the party on the vital question of tariff and free trade, so that every man may understand what the principles are, and it may some day elect a President.

I ask Senators now, whether in their serious moments they marveled at their inability to know whether I was or am a democrat? Who here are the oracles of this alleged democratic party? and who its accredited leaders? I see on this floor a combination of all sorts of conflicting elements and antagonistic views, calling itself a democratic party, horrified at readjustment, but making no complaint of repudiation, ready at all times not only to claim but to invite and invoke the vote of the Southern States in presidential elections. Readjusters are unfit associates for that party, but the Senators who represent States that in some way or other have gotten rid of so many millions of their public obligations are very proper associates. But when I come to analyze it I am left to conjecture for myself which best embodies the essence of democracy—the stalwart, hard-money democracy of Delaware, the stalwart greenback democracy of Indiana, or that ingenious contrivance called the "Ohio idea," of which the Senator [Mr. PENDLETON] is the putative father. When I look to its leadership here I am equally dumbfounded. If I judge from the frequency of his speeches and his assumption of right to direct me, I must accept the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] as the wearer of that honorable distinction. He, too, seems to have troubled dreams about readjustment and what it means, yet I question whether the world has produced a man who could so readily readjust himself to all conditions and to all circumstances. He says he has always been true to principle—always ready to sacrifice his own ambition and his own fortune for the good of the country. It was unnecessary to state the last to Senators who see him standing here without ambition and without fortune. When he pursues a principle he does it with alacrity. He got ahead of the people and the democratic party in the effort to dissolve the Union, and was the first governor of a Southern State to confiscate private property in the port of Savannah, and seized Fort Pulaski and a Government arsenal before the act of secession. Rumor, that old dame that is whispering in his ear about me, says that his objective point then was the presidency of the confederacy. In the struggle that ensued he was earnest for the cause till its fortunes began to wane, and with his militia he abandoned the starry cross to its fate. After the war we hear of him in the Chicago republican convention to nominate a President, there as here imitating if not rivaling the Laureate's stream, which says, (with some license of my own:)

Men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever.

We next hear of him as a radical candidate for the United States Senate and beaten by a more moderate republican, Joshua Hill, by a combination of democrats with the republicans. He next appears as the appointee of the carpet-bag Governor Bullock as chief-justice of the State supreme court, which position he subsequently resigned to take the presidency of a railroad. Now we have him here the leader of a party he calls democratic. His explanation of all this is that the democratic party erred and abandoned him, now it has righted itself and rallied upon his grand reserve of undying, unchangeable principles. Mr. President, this probably accounts for my anomalous position. When the democratic party went in search of the Senator from Georgia it left me. [Laughter.] Like him I shall try to hold this position till it returns, in the mean time sacrificing all my ambition and all my fortune. When they return I may be crowned its leader for the same reasons that induced it to wreathe the forehead of the venerable Senator.

Mr. President, I cannot part with the distinguished Senator until I have relieved his mind of all the perplexity I have occasioned it. There are rumors, he says, of a bargain. If I am the recipient of any consideration here I suppose I am much indebted for it to the fact that the Senator did not know of the opportunity. But I will in this connection answer all the innuendoes of Senators on this point distinctly. With due regard for the dignity and decorum of this body, I hurl back with scorn and contempt every imputation from whatsoever quarter that my action here has been induced by any other consideration than the promotion of the interests of my people and the welfare of the whole country. No gentleman in any station will constitute himself a searcher of the human heart and presume to evolve the motives which should prompt representative conduct.

If rumor is to be brought into this Chamber, who of Senators here could not entertain us for an hour or two with what the breezes wafted here from Georgia about the methods by which the distinguished Senator obtained his appointment here. And who does not know, what is more than rumor, of the indignation meetings held in his State over that appointment. Against all this he now stands vindicated by his subsequent election, and from this he should learn the valuable lesson that every Senator should be left to adjust his accounts with his own constituency.

Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of this Senate for a few minutes longer, to do justice by one for the introduction of whose name here I am responsible. It is reported generally that some Senators of the democratic party are ready and willing to abandon opposition to the further organization of this Senate if the name of Mr. Riddleberger shall be withdrawn. If that be true, I ask Senators to confess the fact and let it go to the country, that they are ready and willing to yield the organization of the Senate if only their revenge can be satisfied in the defeat of one of Virginia's own honorable and honored sons, in the person of Captain Riddleberger. They can yield a complete republican organization, but cannot accept this Virginia readjuster. I note with astonishment the reasons assigned, but discern very clearly the real and underlying ones. Say they, he is of the repudiating party. If so, Mr. President, I, too, am of that party. This I have sufficiently answered for both and for my State. But, sir, I want to reply further to some Senators on this point. They want a solid South. Can they not permit us to join the solid column of States with readjusted debts? Can they not accept a Sergeant-at-Arms who is the patron of the Riddleberger bill? As I said, they represent States here whose indebtedness has been arbitrarily scaled to less than thirty-five cents on the dollar in the aggregate. The State of West Virginia is represented here by two Senators; yet the certificates which represent her portion of the old Virginia debt are worth but ten to twelve cents in the market, and she has never suggested by her executive or Legislature, as far as I can learn, a purpose to pay any part of her share. I might recite the facts in detail in relation to other States, but it would be too tedious. With due deference to the Senators from North Carolina, I shall present a copy of the bill under which the debt of that State was adjusted from nearly sixteen millions, as of before the war, to a fraction over four millions now, and this bearing 4 per cent. I ask the Clerk to read this bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That when any person or persons, holding and owning any bond or bonds of the State of North Carolina, issued in pursuance of any act of Assembly passed at any time before the 20th day of May, 1861, exclusive of bonds issued for the construction of the North Carolina Railroad, or in pursuance of the act of the General Assembly passed at its session in 1865, it being chapter 3 of the laws of 1865, or in pursuance of an act passed by the General Assembly at its session in 1867, it being chapter 56 of the laws of 1867, or in pursuance of an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the State debt contracted before the war," ratified on the 10th day of August, 1868; or any registered certificate or certificates belonging to the board of education, issued in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of 1867, shall surrender and deliver such bond or bonds, with the coupons attached thereto, or registered certificate or certificates, to the treasurer of the State, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of the treasurer of the State, and he is hereby requested, to issue and deliver to the persons surrendering such bond or bonds, certificate or certificates, a new bond or bonds of the State due and payable thirty years from the 1st day of July, 1830, bearing interest from date at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st of January and July in each successive year at the office of the public treasurer.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 4. These bonds shall be exchanged for the old bonds of the State mentioned in the first section of this act at the following rates:

Class 1. For the bonds issued before the 20th day of May, 1861, 40 per cent. of the principal of the bond or bonds so surrendered.

Class 2. For the bonds issued since the close of the war, by authority of acts passed before the war, to aid in the construction of the Western North Carolina Railroad, and the bonds issued in pursuance of the said act of Assembly of 1865, chapter 3, and act of Assembly, 1867, chapter 56; the bonds issued October 1, 1861, by authority of act of 1861, chapter 137, for Western (Coalfield) Railroad; the bonds issued October 1, 1861, by authority of act of 1854-'55, chapter 228, section 35, and resolution September 12, 1861; and the said registered certificates of the literary fund for the bonds issued July 1, 1862, by authority of act of 1860-'61, chapter 142, for the construction of the Wilmington, Charlotte and Rutherford Railroad, twenty-five per cent. of the principal of the bonds or certificates so surrendered.

Class 3. And those issued in pursuance of the said funding acts of March 10, 1866, and August 20, 1868, fifteen per cent. of the principal of bond or bonds so surrendered: Provided, That all bonds issued in exchange for the new bonds shall be surrendered with all coupons attached.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I desire to make that which has just been read by the Clerk part of this record, in order that it may go down to posterity along with the Riddleberger bill, that after generations may learn the difference between readjustment in Virginia and something else in the State of North Carolina.

That bill followed close upon the executive recommendation, the governor being the Senator, [Mr. VANCE,] in which, among other assignments of justification for such a scale, the losses by that State resulting from the war are included. Virginia makes no such claim and assigns no such reason. She asks no creditor to abate a penny more than the interest that accrued during that war. She believes it to be her legal, certainly her equitable, right to demand this. Is this, then, the real reason why these gentlemen cannot accept Mr. Riddleberger? No Senator can so believe. It is to be seen otherwise in the fact that the Senator from Kentucky introduced here an old musty newspaper with which a chronic office-seeker supplied him. To the fact I answer for Mr. Riddleberger that he did exactly what that newspaper represents, but not for the reasons which that Senator assigned. If Mr. Riddleberger had made that motion of expulsion because that member was a colored man, I incline to the opinion that the Senator would rather have regarded it as a qualification for position here than otherwise. That he is mistaken in his other inference is testified by the records, which show that the republican platform of that year strongly denounced the funding bill of 1871 as a measure procured by bribery and corruption.

If it be the color of the member whom it was proposed to expel which troubles the Senator, he may be relieved by the information that the Bourbons opposed the submission of the brokers' bill to the people—that great measure of the democracy, such democracy as we have in Virginia, which was championed there on the hustings by my colleague, and which is now upheld here by distinguished Senators on the democratic side. I say that your leader upholding that measure, protesting against its submission to the rightful determination of the people, refusing that the freemen of Virginia should exercise the right of the franchise to vote upon a question which not only involved taxation, but which, by the forms of an irrepealable contract, undertook to bind them and their posterity for forty years—I say that your leader protested, among other reasons, wherefore he was unwilling that the people should vote upon this question that he did not desire and he did not intend that the "black herd of Eastern Virginia" should vote upon it, and that too, when it divested the Legislature of the State of all power over its revenues for that time, the syndicates becoming by it the collectors and disbursers of half the taxes before government, schools, or asylums should be supplied.

Mr. President, it is the coming contest in Virginia which makes this opposition to Mr. Riddleberger. His enemies and those of his party know his power, his influence, and his courage. His Virginian manhood and his splendid eloquence are obstacles to Bourbon success in our State. He is naturally dreaded by that Bourbonism which professing obedience to the Constitution of the country as it is yet cherishes by mental reservations hostility to portions of that Constitution. For, sir, our opponents in Virginia nominally accept the declaration of the Cincinnati platform in favor of "a full vote, a free ballot, and an honest count," yet aim to defeat those ends, as is well known among our people, by a constitutional provision prohibiting the exercise of the right of suffrage until the payment of a capitation tax of $1 shall be made. I say that this effort here is to uphold the party that thus defies your democratic creed, that has undertaken by this method of indirection to disfranchise the colored man. Whether my colleague voted for that disfranchising clause or not he can say for himself. I choose to say that it never had my consent either in public or at the ballot-box.

For one I want no political serfs in Virginia; I want no longer any condition of personal servitude. I desire not only in theory the right secured to all men of a free, untrammeled ballot, a priceless ballot, but I desire that there shall be secured an honest count. Whatever may be the professions of gentlemen on that side, I stand for that in fact, and I stand prepared here on this floor, by the courage of the men who are behind me at home, to assure the country that in Virginia at least there shall be a free suffrage, a full vote, and an honest count. [Applause.] I stand here to guarantee the enforcement of the laws by the brave men who stand at my back in the cause of freedom.

I say to Senators, of my friend Captain Riddleberger, that he is made of sterner stuff than they calculate, and will survive record investigations and attacks if but opportunity is afforded for defense. The shafts of my colleague fall harmless at his feet, and he is too manly to cherish feelings of resentment for them. When he says Mr. Riddleberger was unknown in Virginia until the issue of readjustment arose he but argues his own ignorance again of the men and affairs of his own State. Mr. Riddleberger was an active participant in the liberal movement of 1869, and his services were recognized by placing him on the State committee with the lamented Baldwin and Randolph. In 1872 he was a presidential canvasser, in 1873 a State canvasser, and in 1876 a presidential elector. He was a member of the house of delegates from 1871 to 1875, and as such refused to support his party in the proscriptive capitation-tax prerequisites, and, like myself, opposed it at the polls. Though representing the largest democratic constituency in the State, he was subsequently indorsed by being returned to the senate by the second largest majority in the State, and then voted to repeal the capitation prerequisite. He was also made Commonwealth's attorney, and as proof of the confidence of his people is to-day Commonwealth's attorney and State senator. At the time when my colleague was returned here Riddleberger was the recipient of a complimentary vote for a seat in this Chamber. The distinction which he has made as a liberal readjuster my colleague has given him, and of it he is not ashamed, for he would not abate one jot or tittle of his convictions on our State policy for the best office in the gift of the Federal Government. He was a captain of cavalry in the confederate army, receiving his commission as such before he arrived at the age of manhood.

But, Mr. President, records are not always essential to preferment. My colleague was first elected to this Chamber because he had no record. It was at that crisis in our affairs when few men of positive records could get access here. And I may say as much of his second election. If he shall fail to come again it will not be because he has much record. Except that which he has made against one of his own citizens, I know of nothing that can be alleged against him or for him except his remarkable measure reported from a special committee to restore lost cuds, to prevent hollow-horn and wolf in the tail, entitled a bill to stamp out cattle diseases. Mr. President, I am here to vouch for the good character and eminent fitness of my friend, Captain Riddleberger, for the high and responsible position for which he has been named. If you would know more of the true inwardness of the opposition to him I would ask the Clerk to read an extract from one of his published letters on Virginia affairs.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The suffrage question, as it is involved between the parties, is neither a new nor terrifying issue with me. In 1874-'75 I declined to co-operate with our party in the General Assembly for the capitation tax qualification, and I opposed it here at the polls when it came before the people for ratification. I then believed it to be in conflict with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, most certainly a gross innovation upon true democratic principles. There were two reasons influencing its supporters, as I understood them. One was to secure the payment of the capitation tax, the other to curtail the votes of a certain class of people. Nothing is now wanting to demonstrate the fallacy of both. Before the prerequisite qualification became part of our constitution we find the insolvent capitation tax to have been for 1871, $56,952; for 1872, $62,401; for 1873, $61,438; for 1874, $64,425; for 1875, $62,201; and for 1876, $65,356. In 1877 the change began. In 1878 the insolvent capitation return was $71,434, and again, in 1879, with a general election throughout the State, it was $70,992. I have not the reports for 1880, but have been authoritatively advised they reach the full average.

It is apparent from these exhibits that the device is a great failure as a revenue measure. Our people, as a rule, do not want a tax qualification for any other purpose than to aid in collecting the revenue. When it does not do this they are ready to abandon it. Those who would have it because it operates disfranchisement, and those who have acquired an illegitimate influence by it, of course will cling tenaciously to it. We have only to address the question to the good sense and justice of the people of every section. It is not a question of extending or enlarging the suffrage. Virginia went to the utmost limit in 1851, abolishing the last vestige of qualification in her constitution of that year. Every white male citizen of the State over the age of twenty-one years, and a resident thereof for two years, not proscribed by crime or incompetent from idiocy or lunacy, was a voter. So it was when, under the reconstruction acts, we erased the word white and accepted the three amendments to the Federal Constitution. When the Congress framed these amendments they did not mean to have them trifled with. They said we should not thereafter have a color qualification. This is imperative. Then in the second section of the fourteenth amendment we find the following:

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

Here it is explicitly written that no State shall "abridge" the right of suffrage "except for participation in rebellion or other crime." The failure to pay a capitation tax is neither participation in rebellion nor crime. (I will be pardoned for barring the word other.) Therefore to fix such a qualification is clearly an infraction of this constitution which I have at least a dozen times sworn to maintain, and which every properly registered voter is sworn to support. Even if our amended State constitution were a successful collecting agency, I think the people would consider that they cannot afford to repudiate any part of their organic law, State or Federal, for money. Again, the Congress, as if apprehending attempted evasion of this prohibition, affixed a penalty therefor. Having accepted these amendments as conditions precedent to reconstruction; having signed our names to the registration oaths to support them, what conscientious man in Virginia can raise his voice if a republican Congress shall say next winter, when it reapportions, that we shall not have representation in that Congress or in the next electoral college for the 70,000 men who have not been paying capitation tax? As a matter of policy as well as of conscience we should not have this qualification. There the prohibition is written, and Congress being the sole judge of the qualification of its members and the sole authority to count and declare the electoral vote, reserves to itself the power to enforce the penalty. If enforced, as there is little room for rational doubt it will be, in 1881, Virginia, once the first, now the fifteenth, will again tumble, this time to take rank with next to the smallest class of States in the Union. Why court this further humiliation?

I did not stop to count the cost to me in votes in 1875, though representing a democratic district, nor will I undertake to treat this question from the standpoint of dollars and cents now, except as such treatment of it may serve to expose the follies of Bourbonism. We cannot afford to stand in open antagonism to the Constitution and the laws. Our principles have been those of strict construction and rigid adherence. Our interests would dictate the same. With what hope of success can we approach the powers that be for governmental aid while our every act and deed is hostile? One New England State in a period of years has received her $2,275,000 for harbor improvement, while Norfolk, we are told, has had $30,000 in the same six decades. That period covers much of the time when Virginia's star was the brightest in the constellation. If we inquire for the causes of this and kindred disparities of right, we find many of them (thank Heaven, not all) written on the pages of our own State history. We must do exactly right under the Constitution; then demand what is right of Government.

It would extend this letter beyond all reasonable bounds to consider this question as one involving the right of all men to vote, as an absolute, inherent right, resting in nature, and which laws and constitutions should not affect save to protect. Granting it to be maintainable that the elective franchise is still within the conventional power of the State, to be regulated by its sovereign political will, I could never agree that the constitution should provide a license tax upon its exercise. Neither would I class a man among criminals on election day simply because he had not paid his capitation tax any more than the man who had not paid his property tax. The liberties of the citizen are priceless; there can be no adequate price of a vote. The right to vote, said the Cincinnati platform, is the right preservative of all rights. General Hancock emphasized this in his letter of acceptance, declaring for a free and priceless suffrage in every State of the Union. In addition to this, a committee of a democratic United States Senate, Senator Wallace, (democrat,) of Pennsylvania, chairman, have had this subject under careful investigation, and have proclaimed it "unconstitutional and illegal, contrary to the spirit of our institutions, degrading to the people, and furnishing to money and fraud every opportunity to control our elections."

I have to find the first man who can make a creditable defense of this qualification. The substance and end of all argument is that "a man who cannot pay one dollar ought not to vote." The slogan of the revolution was "no taxation without representation." To-day it is no representation unless you pay your head tax. The proper view is to let men vote for those who levy taxes, and then for those who levy to provide the means for collecting them. Louisiana collects her capitation tax almost entire. She makes it a lien upon the wages as well as the property of the citizen, and its payment cannot be avoided. Here we make it the price of a vote, and absolutely rejoice that $70,000 a year is not paid into the treasury. That the payment of a head tax qualifies a voter is too absurd to contemplate. Yesterday morning John Jones was not qualified to vote. Last night David Demagogue paid his dollar for him on a condition which violated a penal statute, and Mr. Jones became a marvelous proper person to cast a ballot. If his tax had not been paid he would have been tried by the judges of election and classed with the criminals, whom alone we have the constitutional right to disfranchise.

Our Virginia people are eminently practical and always just. Nothing but the temporary fright about "negro domination," which was peddled around on the hustings, could have brought about the monstrous innovation of a tax prerequisite in 1875. Nothing but the lowest appeal to venal passion could have held for it the meager support it has since had. It is now well understood that the colored people of Virginia are so located as scarcely to be able to get a dozen representatives in our assemblies of one hundred and forty; and results show that in general elections there are always more white than colored voters insolvent and disqualified. Fifty thousand white and 30,000 colored in the late election have concluded this once invincible cry of "negro domination." All we need to do is to take this question boldly to the front, present it fearlessly and logically; let the people know that readjustment means all the word implies in Virginia politics; that it means the levy of only necessary taxes; that these, when levied, will be collected; and that when collected they will be economically appropriated and honestly disbursed. The clearing away of the rubbish from the capitol discovering near a half million dollars of lost revenues through carelessness and defaults; the exhibit of a self-sustaining penitentiary against a $60,000 annual outlay in past years; the closer collection of revenues and reimbursement of the plundered school fund to the amount of $120,000 in a single year, the detection and exposure of $100,000 embezzlement or theft of bonds and coupons have seriously impressed the people that readjustment is the synonym of reform, and that the time has come for it.

The field for readjustment has materially and sensibly widened. Our chancery courts, with millions of property in their clutches, and there continuing for decades, with hundreds of interlocutory decrees and never a final one entered, and which swallow over a million a year in costs may be considerably improved by a very little readjustment. John Romilly once spoke of the English chancery courts as "a technical system for the creation of costs;" and when that government was troubled about the selection of a safe place for the incarceration of Napoleon it was blandly suggested to put him in chancery, and he would never get out. If that country had its system patented we could be mulcted in heavy damages for infringement. I refer to this, as I could to several other matters, as a hint that those funders who expect now to evade the debt question and simply go around beating the Chinese gong of "capitation tax" and "negro domination" next summer will quickly discover that readjustment means aggressive reform and cannot be put upon the defensive.

Mr. MAHONE. Such are the views of Captain Riddleberger in respect to the matter of suffrage in Virginia, and such are my views.

Senators who have feigned ignorance of my relations to the Bourbon-funder democracy of Virginia and to the so-called democracy which the senatorial caucus of this Chamber represents confess an ignorance of matters about which they are anxious to instruct the country, which wears the appearance of an afterthought born of discomfiture and intolerance.

That I was elected by the party for whom Senators speak on this floor, the Bourbon-funder reactionists of Virginia, the record refutes; and here I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Election of Senator Mahone—Proceedings in the General Assembly of Virginia on the day of his election—Proof positive that he was not "Sent to the Senate as a democrat."

[Taken from the Richmond Dispatch (Bourbon-Funder.)]

MAHONE'S POLITICAL STATUS.

Proceedings of the Virginia house of delegates, December 16.

Mr. Cross nominated General WILLIAM MAHONE.

Mr. Norton, (colored,) of York County, seconded the nomination of General MAHONE in a speech of enthusiastic praise of the general. He said that in the most trying hour of the Commonwealth the general had come forward and done her such distinguished service as should win her undying gratitude and makes his name all but immortal. He begged gentlemen to look at the work of his hands. Look and see what he has done in the way of restoring peace. It was as if an angel had been dispatched from Heaven to make glorious summer in the hearts of the people. He has sworn to carry out the Constitution and to do even-handed justice to all. By 20,000 majority the people of Virginia call for WILLIAM MAHONE to go to the United States Senate, there to represent them for six years. His platform of principles, as Mr. Norton understood, was justice to all without regard to position in life or previous condition.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Nicol (democrat) called upon the gentlemen of the other side to say if General MAHONE goes to the Senate will he go there to act with the republicans or with the democrats?

Mr. Bailey, (readjuster.) If as a democrat, will you vote for him?

Mr. Nicol said he would not.

Mr. Gibson (democrat) reiterated the question of Mr. Nicol. He said General MAHONE was a coalition candidate and not the representative of the Virginia conservatives.

Mr. Payne, (democrat,) before the roll was called, wished to know if General MAHONE will co-operate with the democrats or republicans in Congress, or does he wish to carry readjustment there? He understood they were called upon to vote for a man with the knowledge that his party dare not state his political principles.

Mr. Dickenson (readjuster) supposed General MAHONE would be shrewd enough to know the interest of Virginia and to pursue it.

Mr. Payne (democrat) asked if the gentleman would be good enough to give the name and purpose of the party.

Mr. Dickenson (readjuster) said the name was readjuster, and the purpose and policy to turn Virginia from the downward to the upward road.

Mr. Payne (democrat) said there were but two parties in Congress; with which one would General MAHONE operate?

Mr. Dickenson insisted that General MAHONE's opinions were well known, and he would never disgrace Virginia nor misrepresent her people.

Mr. Payne (democrat) said as General MAHONE was to go to the United States Senate without any avowed principles, he hoped he was not to be in the market.

Mr. Gibson (democrat) said with Mr. Payne's permission he would answer. "I say he goes to represent no party, no principle, no people, but simply BILLY MAHONE."

Mr. Gibson, of Culpepper, said he arose to advocate the election of Robert E. Withers, and to repeat the question asked by the gentleman from Prince William, [Mr. Nicol,] but not answered: If General Mahone goes to the United States Senate, will it be as a democrat or as a republican?

The gentleman from Prince William asked this plain question, and the gentleman, [Mr. Bailey,] instead of answering in plain English, answered as a patriotic MAHONE Irishman, by asking another. "I say he represents no party; no people. The time was when he was a democrat, confederate soldier, conservative. What is he now? Is he a democrat, a republican, a readjuster, a repudiator, or a combination of all these? His present status is most remarkable; our present condition is most remarkable—so much so that I don't believe Saint John of Albemarle could have foretold it."

* * * * * * *

"And now, before voting for him," said Mr. Gibson, "we ask what party he represents? I say that he has been elected by no majority. I deny that he represents the conservative party of the State of Virginia. Hardly one-half of the 175,000 white votes were cast at the late election. He is a coalition representative, and not the representative of the conservatives; and those who have nominated him misrepresent their people."

* * * * * * *

Mr. Payne then remarked that from the support of General MAHONE by the gentleman from York [Mr. Norton] and the gentleman from Russell [Mr. Dickenson] he supposed that General MAHONE would go to the United States Senate as a republican.

[From the Richmond Dispatch, December 17, 1879.]

Proceedings of the Virginia senate, December 16.

Mr. Paul nominated General MAHONE.

Mr. Daniel nominated Mr. Withers.

Mr. Daniel, alluding to General MAHONE, said he was not here to indulge in harsh language, but he would say that no man knows, and the gentleman who has placed him in nomination has not done us the honor to inform us, with what party he will co-operate when he goes to Washington.

Mr. Riddleberger seconded the nomination of General MAHONE. He said General MAHONE had been elected to the position to which he was to-day nominated by the people on the 4th day of November last. * * * General MAHONE would (in Washington) co-operate with the great people's party, which had not yet been baptized.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Paul, addressing the Senate, said that since the foundation of the Republic it had been one of the highest honors of the world to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States, and especially is it an honor to occupy a seat in the Senate from Virginia. He nominated General WILLIAM MAHONE as a man in every way fitted to fill this exalted position. He was the founder of his own claim—a man of the people, from the people, and for the people. He regarded him as nobly fitted, and would nobly do the work that will be assigned to him. He has a generous regard for the rights of both races, and stands in the front rank of the most advanced school of practical politics. It gave him pleasure to nominate such a man, and he hoped it would be the pleasure of the General Assembly to elect him.

The following are extracts from editorials of the funder organ—the Richmond Dispatch—during December, 1879:

"If anything is plain to those who are here upon the ground, it is that General MAHONE has made up his mind to form a new party in Virginia. His organ scoffs at the conservative party."—Dispatch, 8th.

"Pray, what would be the difference between electing General MAHONE and electing a republican? We heard a republican say last Saturday that General MAHONE is a better republican than General Wickam."—Dispatch, 9th.

"Now, this determination of General MAHONE's to form a new party is what makes it so absurd for conservative papers to speak of voting for him in preference to a republican, as if such a vote would be one cast for a conservative."—Dispatch, 10th.

"If General MAHONE is to be elected to the United States Senate, let it be done by the new coalition. Let no conservative touch him. He does not profess to belong to our party, and it would be a shameful betrayal of trust for any conservative to support him."—Dispatch, 16th.

"WILLIAM MAHONE was yesterday elected to the United States Senate by the votes of so-called readjusters and negroes and republicans. The unholy coalition has now done the work for which it was formed. Our reports of the proceedings of the two houses will show the efforts that were made by the true men of Virginia to defeat this scheme.

"It is still true that revolutions never go backward. We need not be surprised at anything the revolutionists may do. General MAHONE has gained the prize which he so ardently coveted; but as he will probably take rank with Simon Cameron and be regarded as a sort of democratic successor to old Zach. Chandler, his fame will not be greatly increased after his associates in that high body shall have taken the measure of his abilities."—Dispatch, 17th.

Such are but a few specimens of the denunciations indulged in by the Dispatch just before and after the election of General MAHONE to the Senate. The Richmond State was just as bad. The other Bourbon-funder organs all over the State took their cue from these two central exponents of their faction.

Mr. MAHONE. Thus, Mr. President, it will be seen that another was the candidate of the so-called democratic party of Virginia, and not I. I was, and I am proud to have been, the candidate of the people, who had nominated me at the polls by a majority of over twenty thousand in the general election which preceded, and where that question, the Senatorship, had been made an issue by the Bourbon reactionists. That majority comprehended a majority of the white vote by full 15,000 and the colored vote by 5,000.

I know of no consideration which could have induced me to have taken a seat in this Senate or to have held any place at the hands of that party, the Funder-Bourbon party of Virginia. I am under no obligations to it nor to its champions, here or elsewhere. My allegiance, under God, is to my country, and my first duty is to the people of Virginia.

That the readjusters instructed their candidates for electors for Hancock and English, as has been here alleged, is true, and equally true is it that they forebore, and purposely forebore, to instruct for these candidates as the nominees of the democratic party; and it is equally true also that they did not adopt the platform of the Cincinnati convention. They planted their candidates for electors and for Congress upon an independent platform of their own making, a section of which I propose to introduce just here:

SECTION IV OF THE READJUSTER PLATFORM.

Recognizing—

So the readjusters in general convention declared—their obligation and proclaiming their intention to support and obey the Federal and State constitutions as the only sure protection of civil and political rights of the citizen, and the only safe bulwark against encroachment upon the liberties of the residuaries of sovereignty in all popular governments, the readjusters reiterate their purpose to vindicate and maintain the constitutional right of the citizen to the exercise of a free and priceless suffrage.

And now, Mr. President, at the time of my election who constituted my opponents? Already, as you have been advised, another representing distinctly the Bourbon democracy of Virginia and the so-called democracy of this Chamber, another representing distinctly the republican party of Virginia—these were the candidates before the Legislature which elected me to this body. I received not only a majority of the so-called democratic readjusters but of the so-called republican readjusters. And now what were the efforts, known there if not here to gentlemen, to defeat me? Were not combinations sought to be made? It is known of all men there at the capital of my State, if not here, that every influence from whatsoever quarter it could be adduced, whether democratic or republican, was brought together at Richmond for the purpose by combination of defeating my election, of defeating the sovereign will of the people of that Commonwealth as expressed on the 4th of November, 1879.

There was a democracy which sought to secure the election of an orthodox, simon-pure, unadulterated republican, but of that kind called Bourbons in Virginia—a democracy which was not only willing but ready and anxious to send here in the place I have the honor to hold a republican whom they would otherwise profess to despise. What for? For the consideration well known there, that they might elect certain county judges and control the State offices, and by that means prevent the disclosures which have subsequently followed since the readjusters have gotten possession of the capitol. That democracy which, like Cæsar's wife, would stand "above suspicion," were ready to trade a seat in the United States Senate so that a few county judges might be preserved, that the offices in the capitol at Richmond might be retained in their control; I say in order, perhaps, that the disclosures which have followed the advent of the party I represent might have been longer concealed; moreover that control of the ballot-box in the State might continue where it had been; so certainly I believe; and all this by those who professed to represent the party which had declared in national convention for a full vote, a free ballot, and an honest count!

Such were the considerations, such I say were the inducements which prompted that democracy to its efforts to send to this Chamber a republican beyond question since these many long and weary years. If that is the democracy that the gentlemen on that side love, I proclaim my inability to co-operate with them.

I supported neither of the candidates for Congress in my district, and emphatically declared that purpose on more than one public occasion, because one was a candidate of that party, the Bourbon reactionists, and the other a Bourbon republican with accommodating views on the debt question.

To obey the behests of the democratic caucus of this body, whose leadership on this floor, whose representative national authority—the one here and the other elsewhere—have championed the cause of the Bourbon-funder party in Virginia, would be an obsequious surrender of our State policy and self-condemnation of our independent action.

The desire of our people for cordial relations with all sections of a common country and the people of all the States of the Union, their devotion to popular education, their efforts for the free enjoyment of a priceless suffrage and an honest count of ballots, their determination to make Virginia, in the public belief, a desirable home for all men, wherever their birthplace, whatever their opinions, and to open her fields and her mines to enterprise and capital, and to stay the retrograde movement of years, so as to bring her back from the fifteenth in grade to her original position among the first in the sisterhood of States, forbid that my action here should be controlled or influenced by a caucus whose party has waged war upon my constituency and where party success is held paramount to what I conceive to be the interests of Virginia and the welfare of the whole country.

The readjusters of Virginia have no feeling of hostility, no words of unkindness for the colored man. His freedom has come, and whether by purpose or by accident, thank God, that, among other issues which so long distracted our country and restrained its growth, was concluded, and I trust forever, by the results of the sanguinary struggle between the sections.

I have faith, and it is my earnest hope, that the march of an enlightened civilization and the progress of human freedom will proceed until God's great family shall everywhere enjoy the products of their own labor and the blessings of civil, political, and religious liberty.

The colored man was loyal to Virginia in all the days of conflict and devastation which came of the heroic struggle in the war of sections that made her fields historic. By no act of his was either the clash of arms provoked or his freedom secured. He did not solve his duty by considerations of self-interest.

Can so much be said of distinguished democratic statesmen who urged the South to resistance in behalf of principles held to be fundamental? Did they, when the tug of war came, solve their duty on the side of principle or self-interest? Virginia has not forgotten her abandonment from that quarter, and needs no counsel as to her duty.

To me and the people of Virginia, the South, as the phrase goes, is a mere geographical expression, and no longer has political idealization. To the noble intellect of Calhoun it epitomized a dream of empire. I do not question the grandeur of that hope and aspiration, but it was quenched in blood, and the South of our day has acquiesced in the decision that war made. The democratic party, indeed, affirms that acquiescence in its national platforms and in the declaration of its candidates.

Mr. President, I am here to assert that Virginia, the mother of the Union, renews her faith in and devotion to the Government that her honored sons aided to construct; and in furtherance thereof I propose to give my best ability and to exert my every energy. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Several Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) Order!

Mr. DAWES. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. What has become of the Senator's own motion, that this resolution be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that motion, I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry the Senator is not satisfied with his own motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that the motion he refers to is the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that debate is not in order. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] Otherwise, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE, (when Mr. FAIR'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] to state that he is paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who, if here, would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea." I make this statement now for the entire day.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) As already announced, I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay." This pair will continue during the day, and I make the announcement now to cover the day.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VOORHEES, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] who is obliged to be absent this afternoon.

Mr. BECK, (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called.) My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still detained from the Senate because of sickness, and his pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] continues during his illness. I will only announce it this one time.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Call,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,
Beck,	Cockrell,	George,	Harris,
Brown,	Coke,	Grover,	Hill of Georgia,
Jackson,	Lamar,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Johnston,	McPherson,	Pugh,
Jonas,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,
Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Slater,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Blair,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Teller.
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—24.

Anthony,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Butler,	Farley,	Miller,	Vance,
Camden,	Garland,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gorman,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I hope now we may have a vote on the resolution. These dilatory motions I deprecate very much indeed. I wish we might get at the public business as early as possible, and I hope we may have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. To gratify the Senator from Massachusetts I move that we do now adjourn and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senate will not adjourn——

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I know it is not debatable.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

Mr. DAWES. I know the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to appeal to the Senator from Missouri, who is so devoted to the public business always——

Mr. BECK. The public business requires an executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know whether when a Senator is called to order, it is not his duty to stop?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is out of order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I announce for the last time to-day that I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) I am authorized to announce that the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] whose name has just been called, is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I reannounce my pair with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. VOORHEES, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] is in the room I should like to ask him if he is not paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] I notice that he voted. I was informed that he was paired with the Senator from Maryland. He has voted without thought, probably. However, it makes no difference in the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Rhode Island does not seem to be in the Chamber.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir; but I see his name is on the list.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	George,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Beck,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Harris,	McPherson,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pendleton,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Blair,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Teller.
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—24.

Anthony,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Butler,	Farley,	Miller,	Vance,
Camden,	Garland,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gorman,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, in order that we may get out of the way the present resolution so that we may proceed to executive business, I move that the resolution lie on the table, on which motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LOGAN. Which resolution, may I inquire?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, well.

Mr. LOGAN. I in good faith inquire.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The resolution before the Senate, the one under consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. There are two, as I understand, before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Only one now pending, I will state to the Senator. I move that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the resolution now pending do lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to say that on the last vote I voted improperly. I was paired; but the fact escaped my mind.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It makes no difference in the result.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I prefer to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the Senator from Rhode Island, as the result has been declared, will have leave to withdraw his vote. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the pending resolution do lie upon the table, upon which motion he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on this vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called.) The pair which I have had for several days past with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has been transferred to my colleague, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] are paired. If they were present they would vote on opposite sides, the Senator from Georgia for the motion and the Senator from Colorado against it.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Beck,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Harris,	McPherson,	Walker.
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,
George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Morrill,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Miller,	Vance,
Anthony,	Fair,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Farley,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vest,
Camden,	Garland,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kellogg,	Teller,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that debatable?

Several SENATORS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and on that question he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the order fixing the daily hour of meeting read. Is there not an order fixing the daily hour of meeting? If so, as a matter of course that order cannot be changed in this way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the order is that the hour of meeting shall be twelve o'clock each day, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Nine o'clock is a little too early to come here in the morning, and I would submit an amendment to make it ten o'clock. I would prefer eleven, but my friends here say ten. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is nine o'clock, which is a little too early. I propose ten, and that is the amendment on which I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Tennessee by striking out "nine" and inserting in lieu thereof "ten;" and on that amendment he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Ten o'clock is a little too early for me. I move to amend the amendment by making the hour eleven o'clock, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think we had better adjourn now; and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn, upon which motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that motion asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I announced a moment ago, and state now to answer for the day, that I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called.) I announce for the rest of the day that my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Groome,	Johnston,	Morgan,
Beck,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Call,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Slater,
George,	Jackson,	Maxey,	Walker.

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Morrill,

ABSENT—27.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Anthony,	Edmunds,	Miller,	Vance,
Brown,	Fair,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Farley,	Platt of N. Y.,	Vest,
Camden,	Garland,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Now I hope we may take the vote on the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] the amendment being that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON,] who is absent from the Chamber for a short time. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bayard,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,
George,	Johnston,	Maxey,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Ferry,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sherman,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Teller.
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Hoar,	Rollins,

ABSENT—37.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Slater,
Anthony,	Fair,	McMillan,	Vance,
Beck,	Farley,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Garland,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Gorman,	Platt of Conn.,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Grover,	Platt of N. Y.,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Plumb,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow. Upon the amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that motion will not be adopted. I wish we might vote upon the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the motion debatable?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his named was called.) As I announced before, I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.] I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) As I announced before, I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am informed that there is no quorum. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] with the understanding that in such a contingency I can vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. What is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The business is the announcement of the vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to ask a question. I see a Senator present who is paired with another Senator who is present, and I am told there is no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum now.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is there a quorum without my vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not without the Senator's vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Is not the announcement of the vote in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be announced.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask for the announcement of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The announcement would have been made if the Senator from Tennessee had not interrupted the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee regrets very much the interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So does the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. Then our regrets are mutual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So it seems.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bayard,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Slater.
Coke,	Johnston,	Maxey,
George,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sherman,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Teller.
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

ABSENT—37.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jonas,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Beck,	Farley,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Garland,	Miller,	Vest,
Butler,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Groome,	Platt of Conn.,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Plumb,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VOORHEES. I see that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] is in his seat, and I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired temporarily with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I do not see him in his seat, but it is the understanding that I may vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay" in order to accomplish that object.

Mr. HAWLEY. I announce that my colleague [Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bayard,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees.
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,

NAYS—26.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Ferry,	Logan,	Sewell,
Burnside,	Frye,	McDill,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Mahone,	Teller,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Conkling,	Hawley,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,

ABSENT—37.

Anthony,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Farley,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Brown,	Garland,	McPherson,	Slater,
Butler,	Gorman,	Miller,	Vance,
Camden,	Groome,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Platt of Conn.,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. What is the motion now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion pending is that of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the resolution now under consideration be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DAWES. I regret very much the delay in the public business; it is very painful. I am surprised that our friends on the other side will indulge in these dilatory motions to this extent, delaying the public business. I am about to make a motion to adjourn, but I wish that our friends on the other side would come here to-morrow, feeling that the public business is of more importance than these dilatory motions, and be prepared to stay here and finish this business, so that we may go into executive session. Hoping and feeling a good deal of assurance that they will come here in that disposition to-morrow, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 29, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I had some purpose of replying to-day to the speech of my colleague [Mr. MAHONE] which was delivered yesterday, but as I do not find it in the RECORD this morning I do not propose to do so now. In the first place, I do not desire to misrepresent my colleague in any way, and I want to see exactly what he did say in the RECORD first. When I see that, if I find anything that I consider proper and right for me to reply to, I shall do so. I will wait, however, until the speech is published before I do.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think we had better go into executive session this morning, so that we can attend to the business for which we were convened here. I understand that probably a hundred nominations have been sent to us by the President for confirmation. I regret very much that my friend from Massachusetts will continue to interfere with public business, which is the consideration of the nominations sent here by the President of his choice; and I hope that he is ready now to move to go into executive session. I hardly think I appeal to him in vain. He knows better than I the importance of action on the nominations which are now pending. Some of them are very important, and the public business is suffering on account of the delay.

I was about to move myself to go into executive session, but I understand that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] wishes to occupy the floor, and I yield for that purpose, giving notice, however, to my friend from Massachusetts that if he does not move to go into executive session at the end of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina, I shall do so.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me a moment to reply to the Senator from West Virginia. I appreciate the Senator's anxiety to proceed as speedily as possible in due order to the legitimate business before the Senate, but I desire to express for one my great regret that the public business is delayed by this debate over Virginia politics, interesting enough in itself and interesting enough to Virginians. I am exceedingly sorry that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] cannot go on with his remarks to-day and have an end of the discussion. I did hope that we all came here to-day with a disposition to finish up this preliminary work before we adjourn; and I hope, consistently with the preparation for debate which Senators on the other side have made about this discussion of the local politics of Virginia, we may go on.

Of course I do not intend to suggest any interference with the Senator from South Carolina, but in response to the Senator from West Virginia, who is so anxious to proceed to the business of the Senate, I wish to suggest that (with that great influence which he is acknowledged by everybody to possess on that side) he co-operate with us in getting to a vote upon these resolutions, which are at the threshold, and over which we must go to get to the public business. They are here, and they can be disposed of any moment by the majority of the Senate.

I give the Senator my word that if the majority of the Senate shall agree with him I shall be as happy to accord with that judgment as he will be; I will never say a word against what a majority of the Senate think ought to be done, and I will take that judgment at this moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator submit to the will of the majority of the Senate without the Vice-President?

Mr. DAWES. I have not constituted the majority; the Constitution of the United States set it up for me. If the Senator desires to amend the Constitution and have a majority of his own arranged, that is another thing; but with the majority that the Constitution, which made him and me as well as the Vice-President, set us up here, the idea of the Senator from West Virginia that he would have a majority arranged before he will submit the question is a new idea.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, before I enter upon the discussion of the general questions involved, I beg to call attention to a statement made by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] who addressed the Senate yesterday, in reference to the debts of the different Southern States and to their repudiation or readjustment. In the paper that he sent to the desk to have read, in the statement touching South Carolina, the debt in 1860 was put down at $2,670,000; in 1870, at $6,540,000; and in 1880, at $7,175,000. There is also a statement that the highest debt since the war, accumulated by that State, was $24,700,000. Very grave misapprehensions have obtained throughout the country in reference to the action of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, and I desire to put my State right upon the record.

It is true that the debt at one time was run up to something like these figures, $24,000,000; but that debt was made not by the true people of South Carolina. It was made by the party with which that gentleman is now acting. It was made by the republican party, by the carpet-bag government of South Carolina; and if there was any repudiation, that repudiation came from them. They scaled the debt.

When the government came into the possession, as it did in 1876, of the legitimate rulers of the State, the honest tax-payers of the State, what was their action? They did not repudiate; they assumed the debt left to them by the republican government; and when some question arose, knowing, as they did, that that debt was in large part a fraudulent one, the first democratic Legislature that we had appointed a tribunal, composed of three of the circuit judges, leaving to them to pass an opinion upon the validity of the debt, and the State divested herself of her sovereignty so far as to allow herself to be sued. She allowed the bondholders to go into that court and make their case, and it was provided that if that court decided adversely to the bondholders they might have the right to go before the supreme court, and if that court decided adversely they might bring up their case before the Supreme Court of the United States, the State, of course, having no right to appeal if the decisions of her own courts were adverse to her. When it was brought before the supreme court, the chief-justice of which was a republican and a northern man, an honorable man and an unimpeachable judge, that court did decide that about a million dollars of this debt was invalid. The bondholders had the right, then, to carry it up to the Supreme Court to test the question there; but they were so well satisfied with the decision that they accepted it, and the bonds of South Carolina are now above par.

I deny, therefore, that the democratic party of that State has repudiated. I deny it, and I say that that State took as honorable and as just a course as it was possible for any people to do. Finding that statement made, I only desired to put my State right upon that before I entered upon the general discussion of the question before us.

Mr. BUTLER. If my colleague will pardon me one moment, I desire to supplement what he has just said so well by emphasizing a statement which he made to the effect that the only repudiation of any debt of any amount in that State was made by a republican Legislature at the time the State was under the control of a republican governor, when the treasurer was a republican, the comptroller-general a republican, the secretary of State a republican, and the entire State government in the hands of the republican party, Governor Chamberlain at that time being the governor of the State; and that Legislature and that government divided the debt by two, scaling it down fifty cents on the dollar.

If my colleague will pardon me for completing what I was about to say, I am therefore indebted to the Senator from Virginia for the opportunity he gives us of putting the State right upon the record in this regard. South Carolina has never repudiated one dollar of her honest indebtedness except by a republican government of that State.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator to complete the information in question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If the republican State government, as I understand the Senator, repudiated half the honest debt, have the democratic State government done anything toward paying it since they came into power?

Mr. BUTLER. The democratic government of South Carolina did a great deal more than the government of Massachusetts with reference to one of her debts; she left it to a special court, in which the bondholders, the creditors of the State, acquiesced, and the whole question was submitted to this special court, as my colleague said, with the right of appeal to the supreme court of the State, and from that to the Supreme Court of the United States. No demand was made by the creditors to have the adjustment made by the republican government interfered with.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator it was not repudiation of the honest debt, in the judgment of that court. The point of my question was this: how can that be repudiation when the republican government did not pay it, which is not repudiation but an honest performance of the obligation when the democratic party coming into power did not do anything to pay it?

Mr. BUTLER. The understanding of the Senator from Massachusetts must be very obtuse, intensely obtuse. I said that the republican government of South Carolina repudiated fifty cents on the dollar and issued bonds for only fifty cents on the dollar of the debt, and these bonds went into the hands of the creditors. It was not at all necessary for the democratic government of the State to go to those creditors and say, "Give up those bonds."

Mr. HOAR. I think we all see the point, Mr. President.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very glad the Senator from Massachusetts does see the point.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, in the anomalous condition existing in this Chamber between the two great political parties the position of each member of this body should be defined. In order that no possible shadow should rest on mine, I beg to trespass on the indulgence of the Senate while I present very briefly the reasons which influence my action. The condition in which the opposing parties are placed is one never known before in our political experience, and it demands thoughtful consideration not only from us but from the whole country. When the Senate convened in extraordinary session on the 4th March it was composed, as we had every reason to suppose, of thirty-eight democrats, thirty-six republicans, and one independent. The latter, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] promptly announced that he should vote with the democrats, while he disclaimed with characteristic patriotism all intention of accepting the high position assigned him as chairman of one of the most important committees—a position for which he was eminently fitted, and which was tendered to him as a well-merited tribute to his character and his ability. By the mysterious dispensation of Providence one chair on the republican side had been made vacant by death, and I need not say that we of the other side shared sincerely in the sorrow felt by the whole country for the loss of one of its ablest and brightest intellects; a colleague who, while opposed to us politically, had won our regard personally, and who commanded our admiration by his ability and his courage. Three more vacancies on that side were made by the action of the President in calling to his Cabinet members of this body.

Thus it happened that the democrats found themselves at the beginning of the session in a clear, legitimate, undisputed, constitutional majority. They were ready and willing to proceed at once to discharge the duties for which they had been called together. They prepared promptly to fulfill those duties, following the time-honored precedents and the constitutional methods which have always heretofore obtained in this Chamber. How were they met by the other side? It would be scarcely proper to characterize their conduct here in the terms which would be most natural and proper elsewhere. I prefer simply to state facts, leaving the great tribunal of public opinion to pass judgment on that conduct. But I will say that in my opinion the course pursued by our opponents was subversive of all the usages and precedents of this body, and is fraught with infinite danger to the legislative branch of our Government. For several weeks a minority of this body deliberately obstructed its legitimate business, and they did this by open, palpable, direct violation of the rules of the Senate, those rules which were ordained for the transaction of business in an orderly and decent mode and for the preservation of the dignity and the decorum which should always mark our proceedings.

The published Journals of the Senate furnish ample proof of the correctness of this statement, and I desire to call the attention of the country to the deplorable condition of affairs in this Chamber, brought about by the republican minority. I have faith in the sense of fair dealing, of manliness, of honesty, which marks our people, and I cannot believe that any party which clutches desperately by questionable means at power can maintain its hold on popular confidence. I believe that the sober second thought of the people will condemn and repudiate such a party, for it would indicate a frightful decadence of public and private virtue were it otherwise. In this faith I am well content to leave the conduct of the republican party on this floor to the impartial judgment of the people.

There is another and a very grave aspect in which this subject should be considered, one altogether apart from it as a question of political ethics, and that is in a practical point of view, as it may affect our legislation. As the Senate is constituted at present neither party has a quorum. Now, has it occurred to Senators what might result from this unprecedented condition of affairs should either side adopt the desperate course lately resorted to by the republicans in refusing to vote when present, and thus breaking a quorum? Do these gentlemen realize the dangerous, the fatal tendency of the pernicious system they have inaugurated? Should this system obtain here, either party in the Senate, as the numbers now stand, could exercise an absolute, despotic power to veto all legislation. This power would be far more comprehensive than that exercised by the President in a veto, for the Constitution provides the means of counteracting a presidential veto, but it provides none to protect that instrument itself or the established privileges of this body from such dangerous and revolutionary action as we have witnessed here of late. If it is to grow into a precedent—and for the honor of this body I trust it never may—we who hold our seats here as representatives of great States will bring deserved rebuke upon ourselves for degrading the highest legislative tribunal in our country. We cannot be fit to hold our seats in this Chamber unless we maintain rigidly the honor and the dignity pertaining to it, and we can do this only by a strict observance of the laws and the rules made for our governance. It will be an evil day for the country when all the barriers that time, precedent, custom, and law have carefully erected shall be rudely broken down by a desperate moiety of this body to secure partisan ends, and I beg Senators to consider whether any party success would justify them before the country in gaining a mere temporary triumph by means which, if not disreputable, are certainly questionable.

We have heard much from the other side of the obligations and the rights of a constitutional majority of this body, and we are denounced for not yielding promptly to every demand of what is claimed to be such a majority. What is that asserted majority? I deny that such a majority exists. The Constitution provides that the Senate "shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years." "The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided." "The Senate"—that Senate which is composed of two Senators from each State, and that alone—"shall choose their other officers." The Constitution fixes the composition of the Senate; it gives to the Senate the exclusive right to choose its other officers after providing that the Vice-President shall be the presiding officer, but it nowhere clothes him with the absolute power to choose the other officers of the Senate. The body is competent to do that of itself and by itself when a majority of its members desires to do so.

It has been clearly demonstrated by the result of many votes on this question that a majority of the Senate does not choose to elect any officers at this session. What may be the wishes of the Vice-President on this subject I do not know; but as he is not a member of this body I submit most respectfully that we should not call on him as arbitrator to discharge what could not be other than a most delicate and painful office to an honorable man—that of ejecting officers perfectly satisfactory to one-half of this body and choosing others objectionable to the same number. When a majority of the Senate desires to change its officers it will be time enough to consider that matter.

My anxious consideration for your tender feelings, Mr. President, makes me solicitous to aid in protecting them from a violent shock. Already, sir, in your brief service as presiding officer you have won for yourself the proud distinction of having "untied the senatorial knot," as the distinguished Senator from Illinois expressed it, oftener, I suppose, than all your predecessors combined, and when you retire to private life, to wear there worthily the laurels which you won here so bravely, you will always cherish a sense of profound gratitude to the democrats of this body for having saved you once, at least, from a most painful, embarrassing, and unpleasant exercise of a most doubtful prerogative.

Apart from this consideration, which has its proper influence with me, there is another of great weight, and that is suggested by the terms of the proclamation of the President calling us together. The objects for which we were thus summoned to meet are thus stated:

> Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

Now, sir, has any communication come from the President to the effect that it is an object of interest to the United States that the Senate should turn out its competent officers and choose others? Such a message may have come, but if it has it lies on your desk unacted on because the especial friends of the Administration refuse persistently to proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is our duty to go into executive session at once, in order to ascertain if the President deems it an object of interest to the United States that a readjusting, repudiating debt-payer and a republican Hancock elector should be made Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. Should such a communication be among those important papers which lie unopened upon your table, and which our republican friends will not allow us to consider, this side will give it all the respectful consideration it demands. But until we can be apprised that the President regards the selection of officers for this body of graver importance to the public interests, I venture to assert that these interests will be best subserved by our devoting ourselves to the discharge of the specific and legitimate business for which we have been convened, and that is "to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to us on the part of the Executive." Proper respect for that distinguished gentleman as well as self-respect should compel us to do this promptly.

Mr. President, this is no petty scramble on our side for a few paltry offices. It rises to a much higher plane than that; it has a nobler aim, and it involves a great principle. It is true that we should regard it as an act of cruel injustice to displace officers who have proved themselves honest, acceptable, and competent, without one word of warning to them, and when they had every reason to suppose from the political outlook that no change would be made at present.

The democratic States had and have a legitimate majority in this body, and the officials appointed by that party had every right to suppose that they would hold, for the present at least, the places to which they had been assigned and for which they had proved themselves thoroughly fit. Nor was this the only reason they had for the confidence they felt that they should not be removed. They had the assurance, I may say the pledge, from the Senator from Rhode Island, the father of the Senate and the chairman of the republican caucus, that they should not be disturbed if they discharged their duties properly. In reply to a question from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] whether "if the Senate should become republican in 1881, two years from now, will you oppose a change of the officers then?" Mr. ANTHONY answered:

> It will depend upon the manner in which they fulfill the duties of their offices. I do not think I shall ever be found advocating the removal of officers of this body who have performed their duties with fidelity, with honesty, and with intelligence.

That was a manly declaration. I regret that the Senator who uttered it has been unable, on account of illness, to be here to reiterate it and to act on it. He certainly cannot, after this utterance, be in accord with the action of his party associates as dictated by the caucus of which he is the chairman. He is too consistent to speak with a double tongue.

The present officers have had no charges preferred against them. They have performed their duties with fidelity, with honesty, and with intelligence; and like the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, I shall not be found advocating the removal of such men. We break the established custom and precedents of this body when we leave our legitimate executive business to enter on that which belongs exclusively to legislative proceedings. Nor is this a question to be settled by a test of physical endurance; it should be determined on the broad ground of its merits, by the rules established by custom and precedent, and on the immutable principles of justice and equity. I regretted to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania announce that the result was to be reached only by a competitive trial of physical strength between the two parties. I regret, too, to perceive that he was the first victim to his own plan of battle. His crest was the first to be lowered, his knightly plume went down in the first shock of arms; and like the unhappy Knight Templar at "the gentle and joyous passage of arms at Ashby," he was borne, if not bleeding, at least senseless, from the conflict. His was an unfortunate boast. "The spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak." His plan of campaign was bold, his maneuvers masterly, his discipline so perfect that even the young and tender recruit behaved like the veteran of a hundred hard-fought fields—those veterans who always fight well when spoils can be captured; his forces were ably deployed, and he told them on the eve of battle, like the great Henry, if his banner went down—

> Be your oriflamme to-day the helmet of Navarre;

but, unlike Navarre, he did not lead to victory; and following the example of another illustrious soldier, the lame captain, after putting his men under the fire of the enemy, he secured his own safety by a timely and masterly, but not a glorious, retreat. I trust that his followers will take warning by his fate and let us settle this vexed matter like sensible men, not like senatorial gladiators. But if we are forced to take up the gage of battle thrown so defiantly at our feet, we shall try to quit ourselves like men. I shall regret not only on my own account to try this issue, but on account of the disabled leader of the opposite side. I admire his courage—more indeed than I do his discretion—and I am sorry that he did not live in those good old days when the gallant clan Cameron, those famous free-lancers and border raiders, carried terror to their southern neighbors, fighting under the suggestive motto—

> The good old rule sufficeth them—
> The plain and simple plan:
> That he should take who has the power,
> And he should keep who can.

Perhaps our republican friends may adopt this motto as their battle-cry. It is a good creed for a party that makes success the only criterion of merit.

But, sir, while expressing my admiration and sympathy for the leader of the allies on the other side of the Chamber, I have been led into a digression. I have said that we were not struggling merely for the retention of a few officials. We made no unseemly struggle to retain the organization of the Senate. We could have defeated the formation of your committees as readily as we can defeat your present attempt to remove the officers of the Senate, but we recognized the propriety of placing this body in proper order to discharge its legitimate business. When we held an undisputed majority we did not endeavor nor did we threaten to bring the decision of any question to the test of physical endurance. We claimed what we regarded as our right with dignity, and we yielded with decorum rather than to obstruct the public business. It would not lower the republican party in public estimation were they to follow this example, for to do right can never injure a party. We oppose your contemplated action because it would break a recognized precedent and establish a very bad one; because we were called here only for executive business, and, above all, because a grave suspicion has taken hold of the public mind that this action is the result of an unnatural coalition and of a corrupt bargain.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] yesterday disclaimed for himself that he had been moved by any impure consideration, and I congratulate him on having done so. But he will excuse me if I say to him in all frankness that he would strengthen his position before the country if he would show what consideration had moved him. The suspicion may be groundless, but it is due to the reputation of this body that it should be proved beyond all doubt to be unfounded. Gentlemen on the other side can readily dispel this suspicion if there is no foundation for it, and I need not remind them how imperative it is for them to do so. The cloud rests upon their characters, not ours, save as we feel deeply any reproach that would touch this honorable body. You framed recently a committee, and clothed it with unusual powers, to investigate a much smaller breach of privilege than is involved in this matter. Give to a committee of your own choosing the same powers, and direct it to ascertain the truth or the falsity of those dark rumors that are flying unchallenged throughout the land. Find out whether any vote in this Chamber has been controlled by the promise of place or of patronage. If the damning charge is proved untrue, stamp out the foul calumny at once and forever. If true, the Constitution gives us a prompt and ample remedy. But do not, I beseech you, fail to meet this issue in a manner becoming the Senate of the United States. It will not do to let this foul suspicion, this base imputation, go out to the world uncontradicted. We know what such a charge can effect, for we know what one of a similar character did effect.

When John Randolph denounced what he supposed to be a coalition between Mr. Clay and Mr. Adams; when he referred to it in those memorable words as "This until now unheard-of combination of the blackleg with the Puritan; this union of Black George with Blifil," he defeated Adams for the Presidency and blasted Clay's highest political aspirations. It is true that the charge was unjust; Clay risked his life to vindicate his honor, and Randolph subsequently made him the amende honorable; but such a hold did this terrible philippic take on the public mind that it affected disastrously Mr. Clay's whole after career, pure, honorable, patriotic man that he was; able statesman, he never recovered from this unjust charge.

For the sake of this body I do not wish to see one shadow, one suspicion, one imputation rest on its fair fame or its good name. For this reason, one touching our reputation, I do not wish to see any immediate action taken on the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Let us take time to act deliberately and dispassionately. A few weeks or a few months are of small consequence compared with the magnitude of the grave issues involved in the proper settlement of this question. All of us are interested to have it settled justly and honorably, and I appeal to the other side to let it rest for the present. Delay will not be dangerous in this instance. A majority of the Senate certainly does not demand instant action, and we on this side, constituting half of a full Senate, cannot be blamed for resisting such action by all proper and legitimate means.

Have Senators forgotten already what occurred here before the expiration of the last session and during this? In whose hands was the constitutional majority then? Did it not rest in the hands of the democrats? Did the minority yield gracefully and promptly then? We on this side strove, but strove in vain, to proceed to the consideration of executive business and to the organization of the Senate. Time and again we were defeated, not by argument, not by legitimate parliamentary tactics, but by open, defiant violation of the rules of this body. Republican Senators sat here hour after hour refusing to vote, and thus breaking a quorum. It scarcely becomes them in view of this fact to assume an air of virtuous indignation or to pose before the country in the role of innocent martyrs because the democrats by legitimate methods resist what appears to them to be not only an act of injustice, but one of inappropriate, ill-timed legislation. We know our rights, and we propose to exercise them in an orderly, proper, and determined manner. No such spectacle has been presented on this side of the Chamber as has of late been witnessed on the other; and, sir, I venture to assert that it never will be while these seats are filled as at present. No temptation to seize or to retain power, no consideration of political expediency, no subserviency to party discipline will force from us a servile obedience in wrong-doing, nor will we surrender our independence, our manhood, or our conscience to the keeping of any caucus. We recognize no autocracy in our party, in our caucus, nor in this Chamber, where representatives of co-equal States meet on terms of perfect equality. We are not a revolutionary party. Had we been where would your vaunted, so-called constitutional majority be now? Has not one Senator, upon whose vote your majority depends, held his seat on this floor for months only because of the constitutional and conscientious scruples of democrats who were unwilling to seize party advantage at the cost of personal conviction? But for our rigid adherence to the line we thought our duty dictated, the seat of that Senator who misrepresents a democratic State and a democratic Legislature would long since have been filled by his democratic successor, already unanimously elected. Do Senators on the other side imagine that when we followed the course we believed to be right we did not contemplate the contingency in which the vote of the Senator from Louisiana might possibly be a most controlling factor in the organization of this body. We realized it then as forcibly as now, and yet we are taunted as being a revolutionary party. Sir, I repel the charge with scorn and indignation; it is unworthy of those who make it and it falls harmlessly at our feet.

The senior Senator from Louisiana, who holds his seat under such very peculiar conditions, contributes to your boasted constitutional majority, and he can certainly claim at your hands equal consideration, equal reward, and equal honor with the junior Senator from Virginia. These two Senators not only make your majority, but they make your committees; they actually make your party in this body. They are the "conscript fathers" of the republicans here; not your leaders merely, but your masters. Every position you hold is by their dictation and at their will, and of you it may truly be said, "a breath can make them as a breath has made." It is a touching sight, Mr. President, to see these two distinguished brigadiers, the Federal and the rebel, clasping hands across the bloody chasm and clamoring for the "old flag—and an appropriation;" to see them, republican and readjuster, shoulder to shoulder, marching on to storm the citadel of Federal patronage. It is a strange sight, too, sir. It must be peculiarly so to the people of Louisiana and of Virginia—those true men who wrested their States from the infamy of carpet-bag rule and placed them in the great democratic column. It must indeed seem strange to them that their rights, their wishes, and their votes should not be respected or represented on this floor.

I have on another occasion expressed my profound sympathy for the people of Louisiana. I do so now for those of Virginia. In the days of the past—the grand, the heroic days—that proud State was wont to speak with no uncertain sound, and her voice was always potential. No State in this Union has done as much for that Union as herself. But for her devoted patriotism there would have been no Union of great and free States on this continent. It was one of her sons who made the declaration that "these united colonies are, and of right ought to be free and independent States;" it was another, the Father of his Country, whose sword won that independence and fixed for all time to come the freedom of these States; yet another lives in the memory of his grateful countrymen as the father of that Constitution which secures the liberties of fifty millions of freemen. When discord threatened the integrity of the young Republic, Virginia brought peace by an act of the most unselfish patriotism and of the most unbounded munificence. She gave to the General Government a domain grand enough for an empire, but not as large as her patriotic heart. Calling to mind all the noble deeds of the Old Dominion—deeds which shed an undying luster on American history—it seems to me that her honor and her fame should be dear to every man in this broad land. They should be especially dear to the representatives of these great States of the Northwest, who hold their seats in this Chamber through the munificent bounty of that grand State. To myself they are as dear as the fame and the reputation of my own State.

Thus it is that I sympathize with her in the misfortune which causes her, in these degenerate days, when public faith is attacked and political morality is set at naught, to speak in this high Chamber with doubtful and divided voice. Whatever is the true voice of her true sons should be heard and obeyed here. Sooner or later it will be heard, and it will command obedience. Knowing as I do the proud sense of private and public honor which has always characterized the people of that State; knowing how reverently, almost religiously, they cling to the hallowed memories of the past, I cannot, I will not, I dare not doubt that their voice will soon be heard declaring in unmistakable tones for the maintenance of plighted public faith and of political integrity. It would be treason to her immortal dead to doubt her. Can she prove faithless now to the teaching, the traditions of that history of hers, every page of which is radiant with unsullied faith, unblemished honor, and untarnished renown? Can her living sons prove recreant to the memory of their illustrious sires? It cannot be.

Mr. President, near the capitol in Richmond stands a monument erected by Virginia to perpetuate the memory of the services of some of her sons whose names will live as long as patriotism and honor and virtue shall be respected among mankind. On pedestals surrounding the main shaft are placed statues of Jefferson, of Henry, of Mason, and of Marshall, while capping the column is the majestic figure of Washington, "seated in massy strength." A poet of Virginia, addressing this august group, asks:

> Could life awaken in the limb of bronze
> And blaze in the burnished eye,
> What would ye do with your moment of life,
> Ye men of the days gone by?

Could these heroes and sages be recalled to life, with what feelings would they behold the State they loved and served so well a prey to domestic dissension, torn by unseemly discord and apparently hesitating on the brink of financial dishonor. I imagine that their thoughts could be easily read. It seems to my mind's eye I can see them looking with shame and humiliation upon this sad spectacle. I can see Washington bearing the stainless sword that won our liberties; I see Patrick Henry as he utters that immortal call to arms that rang throughout the land like the blast of a bugle; I see Jefferson grasping in his hand the scroll that declared us free; I see Mason holding aloft the bill of rights; and I see Marshall clothed in his spotless ermine, pointing to the law of which he was the ornament as well as the expounder. In imagination I can see these mighty dead, these great Virginians "of the days gone by," and as their forms fade from sight the thought comes to my mind and the words to my lips:

> Shrine of the mighty! can it be
> That this is all remains of thee?

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, I have no desire to make a speech on this question. I rise simply for the purpose of saying that so far as the honorable Senator from South Carolina is disposed to attribute credit to this side for what he calls their magnanimous conduct in having refused to unseat the sitting Senator from Louisiana and to seat the contestant when we were in the majority here, I wish to disclaim all share of that honor, and I know there are many gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who share with me in the disclaimer.

There can be no comparison drawn between Louisiana and Virginia. However unfortunate Virginia may be in her representation here, she has two Senators elected by the Legislature of her State, and no one questions that fact. The condition of Louisiana in that respect has been too often discussed for me to elaborate it. I will only say that the people of Louisiana not having had the benefit of the assistance of the honorable Senator in righting the great wrong that they think was committed upon them, will try to do without his sympathy and to bear that wrong in silence.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, the Senate was convened in extraordinary session on the fourth day of the present month by a proclamation of the late President which, as is well known, was issued after conference with the present Executive and in accordance with his wishes. That proclamation declared that the business which required that the Senate should be convened at that time was to receive and act upon such communications as might be made to it on the part of the Executive.

At the time that proclamation was made it was well known to the present Executive that a vacancy existed in this body and that others would be created by his own act in calling upon certain Senators to accept positions in his Cabinet.

Upon the assembling of the Senate it proceeded without delay to confirm the Cabinet ministers selected by the new President, and such other of his appointees as were men of national reputation and whose appointments could with safety and propriety and according to usage be acted upon without reference to a committee.

This done, the republican minority of the Senate as it was then constituted refused to permit the democratic majority to proceed further with the business for which alone the Senate was convened unless the democratic majority would consent to pass upon each nomination without having the same first examined into by a committee in the usual and orderly manner to ascertain whether or not it was one which ought to be confirmed, or unless that majority would consent that the committees of the Senate should be selected by the then existing republican minority. It was of course impossible for the majority of this body as it was then constituted to consent, without forfeiting its self-respect and the respect of the country, to the monstrous and theretofore unheard-of proposition that what was then conceded to be a minority of the body should be allowed to select its committees and shape its business because that minority chose to assert that at some day in the future it would be transformed into what it saw fit to style a constitutional majority of this body. The truth of that assertion was not apparent, indeed it was hard to understand how it could be true. In the presidential campaign through which we have so recently passed, as is well known, thirty-nine members of the present Senate, one more than an even half of the body when all its seats are full, supported the democratic nominees for President and Vice-President.

This seemed to be conclusive upon the question as to which would be the majority party in the Senate after the then existing vacancies were filled, unless for once some Senator's political convictions as expressed in the choice of his candidates for President and Vice-President were not to be his guide in the selection of his political associates. It was not to be believed that any Senator occupied this anomalous position unless upon clear proof, and no proof whatever was produced. Instead of proof, the democrats were asked to accept as true the vague and unsupported assertion that when the then existing vacancies in this body were filled they would find themselves, in some unexplained way, in a constitutional minority of the body; and, with an assurance worthy of a better cause, they were asked to surrender their rights and responsibilities as the party then concededly in the majority and to permit them to be assumed by the minority party in the body.

This request—or, more properly speaking, demand—being necessarily refused, the republican members of the Senate saw fit to resort to dilatory motions and the various devices of parliamentary tactics, which have come to be known as "filibustering," by which they prevented any further progress from being made in the public business until the session had lasted two weeks. This conduct on their part, no matter what their intent, was in its effect an act of disrespect to the President of the United States, as it was equivalent to a continued and oft-repeated declaration upon their part that he had convened them in extraordinary session at a time and under circumstances when, from a party stand-point, he ought not to have called them together, and that the public business for the transaction of which they were convened should not be considered until such time as in their judgment he ought to have selected for their assembling.

As already indicated, no considerable progress was made in the public business during the first two weeks of the session, owing to the parliamentary tactics to which the republican Senators resorted to prevent its consideration. Then, the vacancies existing at the opening of the Senate being filled, the republican Senators temporarily abandoned their attempt to obstruct the public business, and permitted a vote to be taken upon the resolution which had been offered by the democrats at an early day of the session, providing for the appointment of the usual committees of the body, many of which were absolutely essential to the conduct in a discreet and judicious manner of the business of the session. That vote disclosed the fact that the thirty-seven republican Senators had secured the co-operation of a Senator who had supported at the recent election the democratic candidate for the Presidency, and were able to prevent the organization of the committees as proposed by the democratic Senators.

As soon as this fact was made apparent, the democrats, instead of imitating the parliamentary tactics of their opponents and preventing the organization of the committees, as they might have done for an indefinite period, permitted the republicans to have a vote without any delay whatever upon the resolution which they then offered for the appointment of the committees, and to carry that resolution by the casting vote of the Vice-President. If the case rested here the conduct of the two parties, that of the democrats in attempting to expedite the public business and that of the republicans in attempting to obstruct it, would be sufficiently in contrast; but that contrast has been greatly strengthened by the subsequent conduct of the republican Senators.

As soon as the republicans had obtained control of the committees they discharged old clerks and appointed others in their stead, with a haste that made it apparent to the dullest observer that their course in obstructing and preventing the transaction of the public business until such time as they could secure the committees was not actuated so much by a desire to be in a situation to control the disposition of that business through the agency of the committees as it was by desire to possess themselves of the few paltry clerkships which were under the control of the committees.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to make a remark right there?

Mr. GROOME. I would prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What I desire to say is——

Mr. GROOME. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That all the democratic committee clerks have not been discharged——

Mr. GROOME. I am aware that the Senator from Wisconsin has made a notable exception in the case of Mr. Morrow, an exception for which I give the Senator great credit.

Mr. HOAR. My friend——

Mr. GROOME. I decline to be interrupted, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I think my friend from Maryland will do me the favor——

Mr. GROOME. I call the Senator from Massachusetts to order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland will proceed; he declines to yield.

Mr. HOAR. What! Is it out of order to ask a gentleman for a courtesy? He can refuse if he choose.

Mr. GROOME. It is well known that it is not usual in this body to interrupt speeches such as I am delivering; hence it is I decline to be interrupted.

Now, to resume, these clerkships secured, the republican Senators, instead of proceeding to the careful and diligent discharge of the important public duties to which they were called by the Executive, began to devote their great energies and abilities to the perfection of the details of a plan by which they proposed to dismiss, at this session, called solely for the consideration of executive business, the experienced, faithful, and efficient officers of this body, and to appoint others in their stead.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me? I know the gentleman will allow me to correct him.

Mr. GROOME. I remind the Senator from Maine that it is not customary to interrupt speeches such as I am delivering.

Mr. HALE. It is only as to a matter of fact. I know the gentleman himself will be very glad to let me correct him in one respect.

Mr. GROOME. If I have misstated, in the opinion of the Senator from Maine, any matter of fact, I will yield most cheerfully for a correction as to the matter of fact.

Mr. HALE. That is all. I understood the Senator to say that upon the republicans obtaining the control of the committees the clerks had all been discharged. I wish to say in reference to one committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, the Census Committee, that the clerk has not been changed, that the old chairman of the committee has been left in possession of the room, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will bear me out in that statement, I hope.

Mr. GROOME. I was speaking, sir, of the general rule. I was not denying that there were occasional exceptions. I had already admitted that there was one exception in the case of the committee of which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin is chairman, of which I was aware.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I desire to bear my testimony to the courtesy and kindness of the Senator from Maine in the case to which he alluded. He has not only left me in possession of the room of the committee of which I was formerly chairman, but he has continued, with great consideration, the clerk of that committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to state the facts with regard to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. If it be deemed material, I will state with great pleasure that the honorable Senator from Kansas who succeeded me in the chairmanship of the Committee on the District of Columbia told me within the hour the committees were appointed that the clerk that I had appointed to that committee might continue on duty there and hold the position during the present session, and he is still there on duty.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I would like to ask my honorable friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] if he thinks there was any undue haste to turn out the clerk——

Mr. GROOME. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that when he asked to interrupt me just now I did not understand that he wished to state a fact. I supposed he wished to inject an argument into my speech.

Mr. HOAR. Not at all.

Mr. GROOME. I will yield cheerfully to the Senator from Massachusetts for a statement of fact.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to say that it was my desire, as my friend from Delaware will testify, that the very accomplished gentleman who was the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections should continue in that office, and it was only his own convenience that prevented. I ask my friend if that be not so?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is true. He called on me and stated to me his desire that the former clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections should continue during the present session.

Mr. BECK. Now will the Senator from Maryland allow me to make a statement?

Mr. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Maryland just a moment by the statement of a fact which I think he will be glad to learn; that is, that the clerk of the Committee on Public Lands under my predecessor, the late Senator from Indiana, is not only still the clerk of that committee, but has been reappointed.

Mr. BECK. I only rise to suggest to the gentlemen on the other side that as they have so little use for clerks and committee-rooms, I do not see why they should make such an unseemly squabble to get rid of two or three very competent officers we have here now. If they have been so courteous all around, why not go on with public business and let these few men stay where they are?

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I was simply stating the general rule, a general rule known to every Senator in this body and a rule the existence of which will not be denied by any Senator, that in an overwhelming majority of cases the clerks to the old committees were removed with the most extreme haste after the new committees were created. Upon the next day after the creation of the new committees, and for a day or two thereafter, the newspapers of this land contained the announcements of the appointment of many gentlemen as clerks of certain committees in this body in the stead of other gentlemen summarily dismissed. That is a matter of general knowledge. I had not denied, and I did not propose to deny, that there were a few notable exceptions in which the chairmen of certain committees had appointed or retained old and efficient clerks, following therein an example that was very liberally indulged in two years ago when the democratic party came into power upon this floor and retained those of the old clerks whom they realized to be capable and efficient officers whose places it would be hard to fill with men so thoroughly experienced and so competent to discharge the duties required of them. So I say these unusual interruptions were entirely unnecessary, as the proposition I stated is true as a general rule, and it was only stated as a general rule. Its accuracy is not in the least shaken by the fact that there exist a few cases in which republican chairmen of committees for this called session have not deemed it wise to discharge the old clerks, and I hope and I would be glad to have the assurance from these republican chairmen that when the Senate convenes in regular session in December they will act as liberally in reference to the few particular clerks they have retained as they have done at this session.

I was saying, sir, when interrupted, that as soon as this matter of clerkships had been disposed of by the republican Senators they began to devote their great energies and abilities to maturing the details of a plan by which they hoped that at this session, called solely for the consideration of executive business, they would be able to secure the dismissal of the experienced, faithful, and efficient officers of this body, and to appoint others in their stead. To do so is against precedent. The public interest does not require it. On the other hand, the public interest would be best served by retaining in their positions the present officers of this body. There is no possible reason for a change except that it would afford the republican Senators an opportunity to remove a few democrats from official positions which they have filled with credit to themselves and with advantage to the body which they serve. The details of the plan were soon agreed upon, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] offered his resolution to carry that plan into effect. But an obstacle to its consummation immediately presented itself which could hardly have been wholly unexpected. It was found that the democratic Senators still resolutely maintained the position which they assumed at the opening of the session, and which, unless all signs fail, they will continue to uphold as long as the necessity for its maintenance exists. That position is that this extraordinary session of the Senate was called for the consideration of such executive communications as might be made to it, and ought to be devoted to business of that character, and other business incident to it, as, for example, the selection of committees, without which it is impossible to consider carefully and act judiciously upon the executive business upon which we are called to pass judgment, and that no other business ought to be considered at the session, or at any rate not until that for which the session was convened has been considered and acted upon. The more that position is assailed the more impregnable it will appear. Why, then, should the republican Senators waste the time of the Senate, hinder and delay the public business, and weary the patience of the country by fruitless attacks upon it? Why not permit the Senate to proceed to the orderly and expeditious transaction of the business for which it was convened, and, that accomplished, permit its members to retire to their homes?

As the Senate has been repeatedly reminded within the last two weeks, the President has sent us a great number of nominations which remain unacted upon, for the reason that the republican members of the Senate will not permit us to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Among these nominations are those for high positions in the judicial department of the Government, from the Supreme Court down, in the diplomatic and consular service of the Government, in the customs, the internal revenue, and the postal service, and in almost every department of the Government. Must all these important nominations remain unacted on, and the public interest and that of the individual appointees suffer in consequence, while the republican members of the Senate protract an unseemly struggle to obtain at this time, in violation of usage, those of the paltry offices connected with this body which happen to be held by democrats?

The two great parties in this land are so evenly divided in numbers that although nearly five months have elapsed since the people voted for presidential electors it is still a disputed point whether the Garfield or the Hancock electors received the larger aggregate popular vote. Mr. Garfield secured a large majority in the electoral colleges owing to the Empire State being carried by a meager majority by the electors favorable to his election. As a consequence the republican party has secured for a new term of four years the immense official patronage of the General Government. It embraces upward of a hundred thousand official positions, great and small, and has its ramifications not only in every county throughout our broad land but in every nation or city throughout the globe with which we have diplomatic or consular relations. The great body of this official patronage is enjoyed and will ever be enjoyed by the party in power, no matter how fond its chief executive officer may be of discussing some utopian plan of civil-service reform or how sincerely desirous he may be of carrying that plan into operation. Cannot the republican Senators content themselves for the present with aiding the President of their selection in parceling out this vast and far-reaching patronage among their camp-followers? Is their appetite so insatiable that it cannot be appeased until they have devoured also our one little ewe lamb at a time when in the course of nature it ought not to be led to the slaughter? For twenty years successively a President of their party has presided at the national banqueting table and has dispensed the delicious viands with which it abounded among those of his own political household. We never murmured. We learned to cultivate frugal and abstemious habits. We almost ceased to crave those delicacies which it seemed were never to delight our palates. Four years ago, when we were invited to the table, and approached close enough to scent the delicious fragrance of the many dainties under which it fairly groaned, only to be rudely ordered away again, we hardly complained of the injustice done us. Still we were never entirely insensible to the pangs of hunger produced by our protracted fast. Two years ago we secured a decided majority of the Senate, and were enabled to set up a little side-table of our own. But after partaking moderately of the delicacies which were placed upon it, after consuming one-half or perhaps two-thirds of them, we left the rest to be enjoyed by our republican brothers. Does not our hospitality to them then deserve a better requital than they propose to give now, when, not content with having free access to the national banqueting table, they propose between meals to seize upon our little side-table and never again to permit us to enjoy a fair share of its delicacies?

Mr. President, I do not claim that it is incompetent for the Senate at a called session to remove its officers and select others in their stead if by a vote it decides to do so. But I do claim that the officers upon the annual rolls of the Senate are elected or appointed for no fixed time, and continue to be officers of the body until discharged by some competent authority. I further claim that it is against the precedents to remove them at a called session of the Senate when, as in this case, their conduct has been unexceptionable; and that it is wrong to violate long-established precedents simply to obtain control of a few offices. But if the precedents are to be disregarded and our efficient officers are to be dismissed at this called session, I ask why do the republican Senators insist upon forcing upon us Mr. Riddleberger, of Virginia, for Sergeant-at-Arms? That gentleman has not been in the past a republican. Why, then, give him the distribution of nearly all the offices of this body, which, as is well known, is made by its Sergeant-at-Arms? From all that I have been able to learn of his political record in the course of this debate, it must be very distasteful to the Senators who have nominated him as their candidate. Why, then, was he so nominated? He was a confederate officer—what the republican Senators are fond of calling upon all occasions "a rebel." That surely has not commended him to their especial favor. The republican constituencies of the North have not been very generous in sending the brave men who periled their lives to maintain the perpetuity of the Union to occupy seats in this Chamber and help to shape the legislation of the Government they did so much to preserve. But, surely, there is not one of them that does not contain many brave, patriotic men, who fought upon the Union side, who would gladly accept this lucrative and responsible position, and would discharge its duties with capacity and fidelity and to the satisfaction of this body. That the selection of any one of these brave and deserving Union soldiers for Sergeant-at-Arms would be more satisfactory than that of Mr. Riddleberger to the constituencies represented by the republican Senators cannot be doubted. Why, then, was not one of them selected?

Again, we are told that Mr. Riddleberger was a candidate for presidential elector on a ticket favorable to General Hancock's election. Has the republican party reached that high plane of civil-service reform that it from choice proposes to bestow its fat places upon those who occupied the most conspicuous positions in the attempt to defeat its national ticket? Have not the able and honorable men who, whether upon the Garfield electoral ticket or off of it, exerted their utmost energies to secure the success of the republican ticket in the late campaign, as they had done in previous campaigns, stronger claims upon the representatives of the republican party than a gentleman who has never belonged to that party, but as recently as the late election was ambitious of the honor of casting an electoral vote in favor of the democratic nominee? Why, then, was not one of those gentlemen selected for that responsible and honorable position rather than Mr. Riddleberger? That it was not because none of them would accept it is amply testified by the crowds of active, earnest, deserving republican politicians who throng all the public places in this city, anxiously seeking to obtain offices less lucrative, less honorable, and less important. Why, then, were their claims disregarded?

Again, we are told that Mr. Riddleberger is what is known in Virginia as a democratic readjuster—that is, that he is a democrat who is in favor of the State recognizing its obligation to pay a portion of its State debt at a reduced rate of interest, and of its declining to pay the residue. Was it his views upon the debt question that caused the republican Senators to select him as their candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms in preference to any member of their own party? Heretofore that party has vied with the democratic party in maintaining the sacred character of the national and State debts, and that the public creditor is to be fully paid according to the letter and spirit of the contract. Do the republican Senators, by the selection of Mr. Riddleberger, propose to announce a new departure in regard to keeping the public faith? Do they mean by their act to proclaim that sooner than permit any portion of the offices of any of the departments of the Government to be held by democrats, they will make a coalition with any set of men, no matter what the views of that body of men may be in regard to repudiating or scaling down the national debt or the debt of any State? Do they mean that in order to enable them to act in harmony with such body of men they will modify their professed belief as to the binding character of the national and State debts so that they and their allies may agree upon a common platform of principles? If not, why have they put forward Mr. Riddleberger as their candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms? Certainly it was not because, as shown by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] the other day, Mr. Riddleberger proved himself, to use the slang of the day, to be the champion bulldozer of the South by moving as a member of the Virginia Legislature to expel a negro member who had spoken in favor of paying the whole of the State debt. Why, then, was it? The only reason that I recollect to have heard assigned by any republican Senator was that given by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a few days since. He said that he supported Mr. Riddleberger because he believed him to be "a man of ability, of influence, of force, of position to exercise that legitimate power in a cause in which the free ballot in this country is involved."

Mr. President, I listened to that announcement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts with unfeigned astonishment. I could not doubt its sincerity, because he uttered it. But I confess I had never before suspected how low an estimate he placed upon the material of which the republican party is made up. Does he not do the republican party serious injustice? Can it be that out of the upward of four and a half million republicans who voted the Garfield electoral tickets at the late presidential election no one could be found "of ability, of influence, of force, of position to exercise that legitimate power in a cause in which the free ballot of this country is involved," and that in order to secure a candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms who possessed these excellent qualities the Senator from Massachusetts and the other republican Senators were compelled to go outside of the republican party? The Senator from Massachusetts ought to know the character of men who make up the party of which he is a distinguished member better than I do, but I confess I cannot bring myself to think he has not done them unintentional injustice.

But suppose he is right and I am wrong. Why, then, did he select his candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms from among the democratic readjusters of Virginia? In every State of this Union—however destitute in his opinion the republican party is of such material—he could have found among the regular democracy, who maintain and will ever maintain the binding obligation resting upon the National Government and upon the State governments to keep the public faith inviolate, many men who measure up to his standard "of ability, of influence, of force, of position to exercise that legitimate power in a cause in which the free ballot of this country is involved." The men of whom I speak stand ready at all times to exert their utmost energies to secure a ballot so free that every citizen, white or black, democrat or republican, whether employed by a great manufacturing establishment of the North or not, shall be secure of the privilege of voting once and only once at each election according to the dictates of his own conscience, and of having that vote counted as cast. They are for a ballot so free that no educational test shall bar the citizen's access to the polls, as in the Senator's State of Massachusetts, and no property qualification shall be required of the foreign-born citizens, as in the State of Rhode Island. Why, if it was necessary for the republicans to seek among the democrats for their candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms, was not one of these debt-paying democrats selected instead of Mr. Riddleberger?

Men act upon motives. The more unaccountable the action the more earnestly its true motive is inquired into and the more surely it is ascertained. What overriding necessity compelled the selection of Mr. Riddleberger? Why were thirty-seven Senators whose previous records indicate that they are in favor of their respective States and of the General Government keeping their public credit unimpaired constrained to accept as their candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms a gentleman whose views as to the right of a State to scale down or to repudiate a portion of its debt are shared by none of the Senators who support him except the junior Senator from Virginia? No satisfactory explanation has been given by any republican Senator of the motive which prompted this extraordinary selection, and I will not attempt to suggest one. It would not perhaps be courteous in me to do so. But that explanation will be sought for and found when that greatest of all human tribunals, the American people, are called upon to pass judgment on the selection made by the republican Senators of a candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms.

We read in the sacred narrative how Joseph in a dream saw twelve sheaves in the field, and the other eleven made obeisance to his sheaf. But—I speak it with reverence—we have witnessed within the last few days in this Senate a more remarkable sight. We have seen the thirty-seven sheaves selected from the most fertile fields of twenty-two of the States of our Union make obeisance and bow down even to the ground to the sheaf gleaned by a motley band of laborers who had nothing in common except the belief that they would be more properly represented in the National Legislature by a democrat who was not in favor of recognizing the obligation of his State to pay her entire indebtedness than by one who was.

It is a familiar saying that "if the mountain will not come to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain." In this case it seems that the mountain came to Mohammed. Be that as it may, we see him standing upon its highest peak, complete master of the situation, able to exclaim with the mythical Crusoe, "I am monarch of all I survey," but hardly able to add with truth, "my right there is none to dispute." And there he is likely to stand until the smouldering fires within burst forth in volcanic fury and consume mountain and man in the general conflagration.

Mr. President, I can hardly hope that anything I have said will cause any republican Senator to pause in the course which they seem to have deliberately marked out for themselves, of preventing the transaction of any of the business for the consideration of which the Senate was convened until such time as they can, in violation of usage, secure the dismissal of the present efficient officers of this body; but to test the effect of my remarks upon them I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Maryland is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. GORMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called.) The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. TELLER. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I announce that now for the day.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] Were my colleague here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS. I wish to announce the pair of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

Cockrell,	Gorman,	Teller,
Conkling,	Kellogg,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I had hoped I should see in the RECORD this morning the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] which was delivered yesterday. I predicated that hope on the fact that the Senator seemed to read his speech not from written manuscript, as is often done, but from printed slips. The natural supposition was, therefore, that it had been revised and that there was no good reason why it should not go into the RECORD this morning after such careful preparation. I was, however, disappointed in that reasonable expectation, and I am left to make some remarks in reply to-day without having that rather remarkable production before me.

One of the points the Senator dwelt upon with most satisfaction was what he considered a dissection of my own record. Possibly it is not very interesting to the country, although the Senator thought proper to bring it before the country and grossly to misrepresent it. He took the position that I had been inconsistent. I must admit that most men who have been long in public life have sometimes been placed in positions that appear to be inconsistent with each other, and I must admit that the position I now occupy on certain questions is not the position I occupied at the commencement of the war, now known as the war of the rebellion. I went into that contest to maintain slavery and State sovereignty. These were the two cardinal points upon which we planted ourselves. I sincerely believed we were right in both. The war, however, has settled both questions. Slavery is abolished and I am now content that it is abolished. Then I was a pro-slavery man. To that extent, therefore, I may be said to be inconsistent, or to have changed position, growing out of the results of the war. I honestly and earnestly advocated then and believed in State sovereignty. The results of the war and the amendments to the Constitution have so changed our situation that I cannot and do not contend to-day that the States are sovereign in the sense in which I then claimed that they were sovereign. Therefore, on these questions I may be properly said to be, as most southern men are, inconsistent. I do not contend now for what I claimed then.

The Senator said, as he is a readjuster, that I had a very happy faculty of readjusting myself to fit the circumstances. I do not know with how much justice I might claim that faculty; but there is one point of readjustment I can never attain. I would be wholly unable to readjust myself so as to occupy the position that the Senator from Virginia occupies to-day before this Senate and this country. I may readjust myself to many circumstances, but I could not afford to be a party to that kind of readjustment. If he enjoys either the distinction or the notoriety he has lately attained, I confess I rather pity than envy him.

The Senator would have you believe that I was a very ardent rebel. I plead guilty to that charge in the fullest sense of the term. When I went into that contest I went in deliberately, with my mind made up that I was right. I was a secessionist, and when I saw that my State had determined to secede I did not choose to have any other power occupy the forts or arsenals of that State as the Government of the United States had occupied Fort Sumter at Charleston. Hence, I took the responsibility to seize those forts and hold them; and situated as I then was, I considered it my duty.

He was a little wrong on one point, however, when he stated, if I understood him correctly, that I seized the arsenal at Augusta before the State seceded. That was a day or two afterward; but I will give him the full benefit. If it had been necessary to have done it to protect the arms that were there and preserve them for our cause, I would have seized them in advance; I have no hesitation about that. I went into the contest like the Bostonians did in the Revolution. They threw the tea overboard, and fought the battle of Lexington before hostilities had been declared; they saw the contest had to come; they prepared for it. They took time by the forelock, and did all they could to strengthen their position. That is what I did at the commencement of the war we now term the rebellion. I have no regrets about it. Situated as I was then, with the surroundings at that time, and engaged in the cause I was at the time, I did what I should do again under like circumstances. In other words, to speak more correctly, I considered that the facts and circumstances by which I was surrounded not only justified my action then, but made it my duty to do what I did.

But the honorable Senator says that I had ambition for the presidency of the Confederate States. There, as in some other cases, his statement is very wide of the facts. There happen to be living witnesses to-day who know that I positively refused to permit my name to be used for any confederate position whatever. I had attained—he says I am ambitious—a point of ambition that he did not attain in Virginia, and failing to attain it he conceived the idea of abandoning the democracy. I was governor of my State at the time; I sought no higher position; my ambition was gratified. The people of my State honored me with that position not only once, but for four successive terms by four different elections. That was honor enough to satisfy the ambition of a reasonable man. It fully satisfied mine at the time. Therefore the Senator is much mistaken when he says I was ambitious for any confederate office. I had no disappointed ambition on that question, as he seems to have in the matter of the governorship of his own State.

The Senator made the further charge that I was the first to confiscate private property at Savannah. This charge is without foundation. A citizen of Georgia had purchased two hundred stands of muskets in New York after Georgia had seceded, but before there was any war or any blockade. The chief of police of the city of New York, who was understood to act under the authority of the governor of that State, seized the guns and would not permit them to be sent to Georgia. I presented that fact to the governor of New York and demanded their immediate release; and as they were not promptly released, I ordered all the ships belonging to citizens of New York in the harbor of Savannah to be seized and held until the guns were delivered, and no longer. I notified the authorities of New York that Mr. Gazaway B. Lamar, of that city, was my agent to receive the guns. After some days' delay I was informed by Mr. Lamar that they had agreed to release the guns. I then released the ships; but before they had all left the harbor I was notified that the authorities of New York again refused to permit the guns to be sent forward, and I then ordered the ships to be detained till they were sent. Not many days afterward the guns were shipped to Savannah, and I then released the ships of the citizens of New York. This is doubtless the confiscation to which the Senator refers. A mere statement of the facts is a sufficient refutation of the charge. I required the guns that were the property of a citizen of Georgia to be sent forward, and I held the ships until they were sent, and then discharged them. The guns were seized in violation of right and of the comity usual between States. The ships were seized to be held until the guns were delivered. I had as much right to hold them as the authorities of New York had to hold the guns, and I did it until I had accomplished my object. I had no other remedy but the one to which I resorted, and I made that effective.

But the Senator says that when the cause of the confederacy began to wane I withdrew with my militia from the starry cross. This is what he is reported in the New York Herald this morning to have said. I have to quote his language from recollection and from the best sources in my power, as he has not thought proper to give it to us in the RECORD. There again he is misinformed about the facts, or he willfully misrepresents the facts. I never withdrew with my militia from the confederate cause. True, I differed with the confederate authorities on the conscript question. I had gone, as I have already stated, into the contest to maintain slavery and State sovereignty. When the confederate congress passed the conscript act I felt, whether right or wrong, that we had not much State sovereignty left when we gave the president of the Confederate States the power to organize regiments of conscripts, and to appoint every officer down to a second lieutenant.

There was a long correspondence between me and the president of the Confederate States on that question; but while I refused to have anything to do with the execution of the conscript act in Georgia, I notified him that under the other provisions of that act I would not throw the slightest obstacle in the way of its execution by him. And let me here state that there was never a single instance during the struggle when the president of the Confederate States called on me for troops of a character furnished by any other Confederate State, or such as were subject to confederate service, that I did not furnish or tender not only the quota called for, but a larger quota than he called for—not a single instance.

Now, as to my withdrawing the militia. When General Sherman's army invaded Georgia I called out a class of our people who were not subject to conscription, and had not been called out in large numbers by the other Confederate States; I called the old men up to fifty-five years of age and the boys down to sixteen, and I required the clerks of the courts, the sheriffs, the ordinaries, the tax collectors and receivers, and all the other officers of every character to go with them, to unite in regiments, electing their own officers; and I raised of that class not subject to conscription about ten thousand men that I placed under that grand old hero General Johnston as soon as possible after Sherman had invaded the State. They remained under his control until he was superseded by General Hood; and then I placed them under General Hood's control. They staid in the trenches around Atlanta until the city was surrendered, and both Johnston and Hood placed on record high commendation of their gallantry and the distinguished service they rendered in the defense of that city and of the State.

When General Hood made his march to the west he did not desire to carry this class of militia with him; the boys and the old men could not have stood his hard march, and they had only been organized of a class not subject to conscription for the defense of their own State. When he left Georgia for Tennessee General Sherman turned upon his heel and marched for the sea-coast. I kept that militia force under arms and annoyed him all I could on his passage through the State. General Gustavus W. Smith, a distinguished officer of the old Army, was the major-general in command of them, and when I sent them around by rail to Savannah, when Sherman was on his march through the State, General Smith asked me if it became necessary to throw them into any other State whether I consented, and I told him without hesitation to do so; and history records the fact that he carried them across into South Carolina, and they fought there the battle of Honey Hill and won a victory over a regular Federal force. They were then returned to Georgia, and I surrendered those gallant troops after Lee and Johnston had surrendered.

That is the way and that was the time that my militia were withdrawn from the starry cross. I was in the field with them, among the last who stood by the cause. The battle of Griswoldville was fought by them against part of Sherman's troops as they went through Georgia, one of the bloodiest of the war for the numbers engaged. This was the way of their withdrawal from the cause of the starry bars. They came at my call to defend their State, and they remained under arms in its defense until the armies of the confederacy had been surrendered. In the mean time they had fought a battle and gained a glorious victory upon the soil of our beloved sister State of South Carolina.

It may not be known to the Senator, but it is very well known to the General of the armies of the United States to-day, that while he was invading Georgia and pressing us to the very last ditch he sent a messenger to invite me to a conference with him, with a view to an adjustment, and I declined to hold it, saying I had no power to speak for the confederacy, and that Georgia, having gone into the contest with her confederate sisters, would be the last to retire and leave them in the lurch. No; I was not untrue to the confederate cause; I spurn the imputation; nor were the troops of Georgia untrue. The militia of Georgia acted gallantly in its defense till the last moment. Therefore that charge made by the honorable Senator falls to the ground as grossly unjust and absolutely untrue.

But the Senator says at the end of the war I acted with the republican party for a time. I stated that the other day. There was nothing new in it. I also stated the other day the reasons why I did it. It has never been questioned that I did it. He says, however, that when the democracy went after me he retired. There is a little mistake just there in dates. If I understand the Senator from Virginia correctly, he never retired from the democracy, nor was he ever lacking in his zeal for the democracy, until he was beaten for governor in the democratic convention of 1877. I returned to the democracy, or they returned to me, whichever you choose to call it, in 1872, when they planted themselves upon the reconstruction platform and nominated Greeley, and I have acted steadily with them from that day until this, in no instance varying from my loyalty to the party or failing to stand by its organization and its principles. I do not think the Senator quit it until his defeat for governor. He felt possibly a little of that ambition that he erroneously attributes to me when he says that I wanted to be president of the Confederate States. He did want, if we may judge him by his acts, to be governor of Virginia, and failed. Up to that period who had ever heard that he was a readjuster? Since that period, if he is correctly reported—I do not know whether he is or not, but I take the evidence before me and presume it to be correct—he did not oppose the payment of the thirty-two millions of debt by Virginia, but only advocated, even after that period, I believe it was, a reduction of the interest to 3 per cent. I will ask the Clerk to read a slip that I send him, which is reported to be an extract from the speech of General WILLIAM MAHONE at Mozart Hall.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Impoverished and disheartened as are our people, onerous and oppressive as is the present rate of taxation, opposed as I have been and still am to such increase thereof, and certain as I am that such increase to some extent must be necessary after 1880, yet to secure the great object of a settlement of this question and to avoid that direst of all calamities to the State, a repudiation of its obligations, unless some settlement can be arrived at upon terms at least possible, though difficult of endurance, I would earnestly advise this people to accept a permanent settlement at 3 per cent., believing that they could, if called upon, see that the quiet and repose gained thereby would counterbalance the hardships of an increase which they are so little able to bear. I would use my best endeavors to secure a vote of the people sanctioning a settlement at 3 per cent. for forty-five years on the basis of $32,977,090 02. And this settlement being ratified, I would enforce it by the Legislature and courts, whose powers I believe to be fully adequate thereto. I would do so because I believe it to be right, because I believe it is the only way to avoid consequences we would all regret deeply, because I believe it is to the best interest of the bondholders and the tax-payer, and because I believe it is a duty we owe to the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Mr. BROWN. If that be a correct extract from the speech of the Senator from Virginia at Mozart Hall, he stood then for the payment of a debt of $32,000,000 and over, with 3 per cent. interest. He was not then a readjuster, and possibly his position on that subject since may be as inconsistent as some of my inconsistencies to which he has referred, and in that connection let me refer to one or two other of his charges.

He says I accepted the position of chief-justice of my State from a carpet-bag governor. While I was acting with the republican party I did accept the position of chief-justice of my State from the governor and senate of Georgia. The gentleman who occupied the position of governor at the time it is true was a northern man by birth, but he had been many years in Georgia before the war and was president of a railroad company in Georgia at the time he was elected governor, and I believe also superintendent of an express company. He was a business man there and not regarded as a carpet-bagger at the time.

However, the Senator says that I then resigned that position and accepted the presidency of a railroad company. That is true. I had a twelve years' term as chief-justice; I had served less than three years when my health began to fail on account of the labor and the close confinement, and I did resign the high position I held and took charge of a railroad as president. But the history of the railroad of which I am president and that of the one of which the Senator from Virginia has been president are a little different. The one I took charge of has been a financial success; I have taken care of the interest of its stockholders; I have made the stock good to them; I have paid its bonds and coupons promptly as they fell due, and it is doing well to-day. The railroad of which the honorable Senator from Virginia was president I think has not so well served the interest of the stockholders, or even of all the bondholders, as it has gone into bankruptcy and had to be sold out for its debts. That is the difference between the Senator from Virginia and myself on the railroad question. [Laughter.]

The Senator turned a period or two upon the subject of bargains, and seemed a little in fear of competition in that line. But I beg to assure him that he has no reason to apprehend danger on that subject. Neither I nor any other Senator is likely at any time to be his competitor when there is occasion for bargain and sale. He went out of his way to state that there was dissatisfaction with my appointment to the Senate at the time it was made by Governor Colquitt, of Georgia, and gave by indirection his sanction to a groundless charge that there was some sort of an improper understanding between me, Governor Colquitt, and General Gordon on that subject. Our enemies fabricated a well-known falsehood, alleging that there was an improper understanding between us. We each stamped it as a falsehood and sent the denial with the evidence to the country. As stated by the Senator from Virginia, there were two or three indignation meetings held in Georgia, gotten up by a few of our enemies, to denounce Governor Colquitt on account of my appointment. The people of Georgia were indignant at the injustice done by those meetings. We both appealed to the people, Governor Colquitt as a candidate for governor, and I as a candidate for United States Senator. There is no allegation in any quarter that anybody was prevented from voting. No one pretends to deny that there was a free vote and a fair count. Every qualified voter in the State who desired to do so came to the polls. My position was fully defined. I announced myself in favor, as I have been for years, of the strictest conformity to the reconstruction measures, in the utmost good faith, and of scrupulous fidelity in the execution of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States with the protection of every legal right of every citizen. What was the result? Governor Colquitt was re-elected as the executive of our State by a majority of 55,000, and I was elected to this Senate by over two-thirds of the representatives of the people. The gentleman is welcome to all he can make out of that charge. There was no sailing under false colors. I ran as a democrat upon this liberal, progressive line; I was elected as a democrat upon that line, and I expect in good faith to so continue.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia was very indignant yesterday; he was hurling back at everybody on this side of the House the statement that there had been any bargain or contract between him and the republicans. I have not asserted it. I did say the other day in debate that the air was full of rumors of that character. I think no gentleman who walks the streets of the city of Washington or reads the newspapers of the Union to-day will doubt that that statement was correct. Not only is the air full of rumors, but it is on every tongue that there has been a contract of that sort. I have not said it was true, but I take it the statement I made and the obstructions that I threw in the way of carrying out the contract, if it exists, must have had some effect. I think, in a word, I did hit cock sparrow, for it is said the feathers flew, and it seems that the ball has left a little sore.

But first the Senator palliates his position on repudiation by saying that other States have been guilty of repudiation. Well, other Southern States have thrown off certain burdens that were put upon them during the reconstruction period by carpet-baggers, as they think, or by the reconstruction Legislatures, where those in power thought the debt was not an honest one. But Virginia can plead no such palliation. I do not understand that her debt was increased to any considerable extent during the reconstruction period. Her debt is the old debt of Virginia, for which she received value dollar for dollar. She got it in the building of railroads, her various internal improvements, &c. She made the debt when there was no question about the consideration, and it would seem that she is less justifiable in repudiating a portion of it than other Southern States would be in repudiating a portion of the reconstruction debt where they got no just consideration for it.

So much for repudiation in Virginia.

The Senator says there has been no contract between him and the republicans. I do not affirm that there has been, but I reiterate what I have said before, the air is full of rumors to that effect, and I believe to-day that a very large majority of the American people are of the opinion, whether truly or not, that there has been such a contract. Well, going on the supposition that it exists, let us see what are the evidences of it. A strong chain of circumstances, connecting well with each other, is the most conclusive kind of proof. Many a man has been convicted of high crime upon circumstantial evidence, and justly convicted. Without any assertion as to whether there has been a contract or not, let me refer to some of the proofs that seem to establish that fact.

In the first, place the Senator from Virginia was a democrat, a true democrat, as he always convinced his people up to the time, as I have already stated, of his defeat for governor by the democratic convention. After that it is true he commenced finding fault; and although he took position for paying $32,000,000 of debt at 3 per cent., he afterward changed that, because it was necessary to make a stronger point against the democrats of Virginia, and he took a position for readjusting that amount and for reducing it in round numbers $12,000,000. The first was to be a readjustment with the consent of the creditors, taking off one-third, as I understand, for West Virginia. The last readjustment, if I understand the question, was $12,000,000 more to be stricken off absolutely without consulting the creditors or without their consent. The republicans formerly called that repudiation. In fact, in my own State to-day, though she does not owe $12,000,000, if she were to strike off $10,000,000 at one stroke of the pen without consulting the creditors, I presume the republican presses of the North and of the South would say that Georgia had repudiated that much. We might call it readjustment; but they would still insist that it was repudiation.

But I have never understood yet that the republican party approved of the repudiation by the other Southern States of the debt contracted during the reconstruction period for which no consideration was paid. No; I think the republican party has stood par excellence as a party of debt-payers. They have held that all debts ought to be paid everywhere; and it does seem the spectacle is a little novel when they take up a repudiationist and a democrat as their candidate for an important office in the Senate. People will naturally say this needs explanation.

But let us go along with this case. When the honorable Senator from Virginia came to Washington nobody here knew, at least the public did not know, what position he was going to occupy. He had always claimed to be a democrat in his State up to 1877, and though he had separated from the organization after that time and established a readjusting party, yet when the two candidates for President were put into the field last summer, and he had, as we thought generally we had, good reason to believe that General Hancock would be elected, and would have the distribution of the patronage, he rallied under the Hancock banner, and his man Riddleberger stood with him. Yes, they were the very essence of democracy; they were the leaders, as they claimed, of the democracy of the Old Dominion.

And it is said—I do not know that fact—that communications between those leaders of the Virginia democracy, General MAHONE, Mr. Riddleberger, and others, were kept up with the democratic executive committee, and even with General Hancock, holding out the idea that they were the true democracy and could carry Virginia for him. But we cannot always tell what the tide of fortune will do. It turned the other way this time, and contrary to our hopes and expectations the republican candidate was elected. Then the Senator from Virginia was silent on his democracy until he came here; no one seemed to be able to locate him. After he got here, the air was full of rumors that there were conferences going on all the time between him and certain republican leaders, and it was said on all sides again and again—I cannot say with what justice—that Mr. Gorham, who is now nominated for Secretary of this body, was in very constant communication with him; that they were good friends, so much so that some of the newspapers have even said that Mr. Gorham was his political wet-nurse. [Laughter.] I do not know anything about whether that is true, but it is evident they were great friends, as everybody admits.

Negotiations or interchange of visits, or whatever they might have been, went on between him and various parties until there was a republican caucus. The same rumor is that while the republican Senators were meeting in one room caucusing the honorable Senator from Virginia was in another room in this building, and that there was frequent communication between them, a going back and forth, consultation, as it seemed to be understood. What was the result? The result was that Mr. Gorham, this special friend of the Senator from Virginia, was nominated for Secretary of the Senate. And who is Mr. Gorham? I understand he was once Secretary of the Senate and an ardent republican. Since that time, if the newspapers are to be credited, he went to his State, California, bolted the republican organization, supported Dr. Glenn, the democratic candidate for governor, and was in effect read out of the republican party there. Still he was the intimate friend of the Senator from Virginia, and when the caucus adjourned it soon came to light that he had been taken up by the republicans again, rebaptized into the faith, I presume, and nominated as their choice above all men for Secretary of this Senate.

Again, Mr. Riddleberger—and I presume he is a very clever gentleman—who had been a democrat all the time, as I understand, in Virginia, and in the late contest, though a readjuster, was not only a Hancock man, but one of the electors for the State at large for Hancock and English, who worked and did all he could to defeat your candidates—he was the right-hand man of the Senator from Virginia; and when the caucus adjourned it soon came to light that by some marvelous sort of change—I do not know how; a sort of hocus-pocus—he had become one of the leading republicans of the United States, transformed in a very short time, and he had been selected in preference to all living men, out of about four and a half millions of republicans in the United States. Yes, Mr. Riddleberger had been agreed on by the senatorial caucus of the republican party and presented as the republican candidate for the Sergeant-at-Arms of this Senate.

I say a man has a right to change his opinions. I have exercised that right in the past, I admit. I may do it again in the future, whenever I think I ought to do it; a man is a Bourbon who never changes; but it is not usual, I must say, for a new convert who has just now changed over to be so much favored by the party with whom he has just united. I do not know for what distinguished services, but for some good reason, no doubt, Mr. Riddleberger, of Virginia, this life-long democrat, this Hancock elector for the State at large, is chosen by the senatorial caucus of the republican party as their first choice for the position of Sergeant-at-Arms.

It may be I have been a little too fast; that I have got a little ahead. I have shown the result of the republican caucus possibly without showing the consideration, as I am now proving the bargain. Before that time there was an election here for the committees of the Senate. We being in power on this side had attempted to organize those committees. You on that side had filibustered for nearly two weeks, because you were not ready, and we could not go on with the regular business of the Senate. When you reached the time, however, that you filled all your republican vacancies and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] had come fully into your embrace, you were then ready, and you went forward with the organization of the committees. As committees were necessary, we offered no dilatory resistance.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire one moment——

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, I will not permit any interruption.

Mr. CONKLING. I will accept that if the Senator wishes it to stand there. I was about to ask him to correct a statement of his own, but if he does not wish to be corrected I certainly shall not interrupt him.

Mr. BROWN. If I have made any misstatement, I of course yield.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the honorable Senator made a grave misstatement, and I feel quite sure an inadvertent one.

Mr. BROWN. I yield with great pleasure if for the purpose of correcting a misstatement.

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the Senator to assert that this side of the Chamber for two weeks had filibustered.

Mr. BROWN. I said for nearly two weeks.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is equally inexact. I rose to remind the honorable Senator that without any motion on the other side to take up the resolution to which he refers organizing the Senate, a good many days elapsed, and that it was not until the week when the seats became full that delays were suggested on this side; so that instead of its being a delay for two weeks or nearly two weeks it was for less than one week. I think the Senator would hardly upon his attention being called to it like to make so broad and I think so unjust a statement.

Mr. BROWN. Whether I am right or the Senator is right as to the exact time the RECORD will show. Of course I have no disposition to misstate the case.

Mr. CONKLING. So I supposed.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from New York, however, will not deny that there was filibustering on his side to prevent the election of the committees. I may be in error about the length of time.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will not feel it an imputation, I will with great respect to him deny that there was filibustering, and I will affirm that in place of there being filibustering there was some earnestness of protest on this side against proceeding at a day so late as it had then come to be, when Senators who had been elected to vacant chairs were some of them already on their way to this Capitol; but I think that protest and that remonstrance fell very far short of what I understand to be filibustering; so that without meaning to do it offensively to the Senator at all, I do respectfully deny that there was filibustering.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from New York calls the same thing by a different name, and I am willing for him to have his own opinion about it. It is very evident that motions to adjourn and motions to go into executive session alternately were made here by the Senator from Pennsylvania from day to day. We call it filibustering; we did at the time. I believe that is what you call it now when we interpose such objections. Therefore, I still say that, according to my interpretation of that sort of conduct, it was filibustering. It was delay; it was fighting for time to get the power to carry out the purpose. You would, I suppose, call it filibustering when done by the democrats, and an effort to secure delay when done by the republicans. We call the same thing by the same name in both cases.

But I will proceed with my narrative. I am going on with the evidence of this contract, and I do not care to be interrupted unless I should inadvertently make some error in my statement. We heard the Senator from Virginia yesterday three hours, and nobody interrupted him once.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Georgia is speaking extemporaneously, and as he is a very practiced debater it never occurred to me that it would be a serious inconvenience to him to have his attention called to an inadvertent inaccuracy of statement.

Mr. BROWN. It has not been by any means. The Senator and I only differ about the accuracy of the statement as it is a question of time. I may have said that it went on for a little longer than was the case. The RECORD may show that I am right, or it may show that the Senator is right on that particular point. He is entitled to his opinion and his recollection of that, and so am I. That point is not at all important in this instance.

We did reach a time when we came to a vote on the question of the organization of the committees of the Senate. There were thirty-seven democrats and thirty-seven republicans in this Chamber. The Vice-President is a republican. The Senator from Virginia had always been a democrat up to the end of the Hancock and Garfield campaign, if we may judge him by his conduct and profession during that campaign. Coming here from that sort of field, with that kind of precedent and course of conduct, with those antecedents, he left the democratic party and voted with the republicans for the organization of every committee just as they proposed to organize the committees. Every vote that he has cast in this Chamber since that time has been on the same line. He has never voted with the democracy a single time.

Now, when we take into the account the two things and put them together, it is a PECULIAR COINCIDENCE, to say the least of it, that the Senator from Virginia, always a democrat up to a very late period, should vote with the republicans on the organization of every committee, and that he should continue to vote with them on every issue since that time; and then in a very short time afterward that they should meet in caucus and nominate his intimate friend Gorham, who had bolted their party a year or two ago and been read out, and Riddleberger, who had always been a democrat, a Hancock elector, who was his bosom friend and his right-hand man, and should put them forward here as the republican candidates—I say there is a very peculiar coincidence about it, to say the least. It may have been no bargain; it may not have been even a capital understanding; but I will call it a coincidence. It is just one of those things that happen sometimes in life, I suppose; but there is something about it peculiar that it should happen under such circumstances.

But there is another point about it which is a little peculiar. It has not been the habit of the Senate to reorganize the officers of the Senate at an executive session. There was one exception to that rule in 1853, when, the tradition says, there was a man in one of the positions who did not give satisfaction, who was not considered worthy, and they took the matter up at that executive session and went into a reorganization, dismissed him, and put another man in his place belonging to the same party, and re-elected all of the other officers. Therefore, according to the precedents, it is not usual at this time to reorganize the officers of the Senate. It is usual to wait until the business session of the two Houses. But after the peculiar coincidence that I have spoken of it seems to become essentially necessary in this case—supremely important—that we should reorganize the officers of the Senate now and elect these two special friends of the Senator from Virginia.

True, as I stated the other day, there are very important nominations before us that it is the custom of the Senate to act on at this time. We are called together by the President of the United States for that very purpose. That is what we are here for. There is a vacancy upon the supreme bench of the United States, and I am informed that court adjourned to-day for want of a quorum. There is a vacancy, as I have stated heretofore, in the Court of Claims. There is a vacancy in the position of the circuit judge of the fifth judicial circuit, where in my own town the term is running and the judge ought to be there. The district judge is sick, and not able to attend to the duties. A judge from another State is there to do district judge's duty, and the United States circuit judge is needed there to hold his court. Public ministers and other important officers have been nominated, and it is our duty to act upon the nominations. But these matters are insignificant compared with the overwhelming importance of electing a Secretary of the Senate and a Sergeant-at-Arms who are the bosom friends and right-hand men of the Senator from Virginia. These other matters that I speak of may be important questions, but they sink into insignificance compared with the great importance of electing these officers here contrary to general usage. That is another coincidence in this matter—another peculiarity about it.

Again I ask, why in the first place should these two men have been selected by the republican caucus over everybody else under these peculiar circumstances, and then why should this stubborn fight be made for their ratification over all the other important nominations before us, and over the importance of three or four treaties with foreign powers? There is another coincidence that is a little peculiar; it happens so I suppose; still the people of the United States will naturally inquire why these things are so. Why is it so? The people of the United States are an inquisitive people; they will look into this sort of thing. We have an energetic press, they are always inquiring, and now these coincidences that are denied to be a contract have been taken up by them, and all around they say it was a contract, and some of them even say it was a corrupt bargain. I have not said so, but I see it in the papers.

I presume it is these peculiar coincidences that cause people to think there was a bargain and sale here. There is one point about it, however, if it is a bargain, (and all these facts and circumstances look very much that way,) we do not on this side of the House intend to be parties to it. If there has been a bargain and sale here, and the contract has been carried out on one side, we will not help to deliver the goods to the other side. We will stay here a long time first.

We have just reasons for remaining here to prevent the turning out of good officers of the Senate (when you have half of them and we half) in violation of the general usage; but we have still higher reasons, yes, infinitely higher, for preventing the consummation of what looks to the country to be what the people of the United States believe to be a contract for the election of these men on account of a consideration received by the other side. If there has been such an arrangement, whether it is to be dignified by the term contract or not, then I believe we reflect the popular will when we stay here and say we will never be a party to it nor see it consummated while we have power to prevent it. I believe we are right when we stay here and call the attention of the American people to this extraordinary coincidence.

All this may be, as I have said, mere happen-so, but it does not look right. There is something about it that I do not fancy. It reminds me of a story that it may not be quite proper to relate here of a 'coon and a polecat, sometimes called the skunk. It is said that a 'coon left his house one day and went in quest of food. On his return he found some other animal down in the hollow of the tree where his home was. He thought it was a cat, and challenged it by saying: "A cat?" "No," said the polecat, "I am a 'coon." Said the 'coon, "You don't look like a 'coon." He replied, "But I am a 'coon." Said the 'coon, "You don't talk like a 'coon." He repeated, "But I am a 'coon." "Ugh," said the 'coon, "you don't smell like a 'coon, and you are not a 'coon." [Laughter.] This transaction does not look like it was a proper transaction, and it does not smell like a clean transaction, and we do not intend to be a party to it. We will do all in our power to prevent its consummation.

It may be that all this ado about it is without foundation, but I think if this matter were put on trial before a jury of the country and the issue was whether the contract could be established, we might apply to it the usual rules of evidence for practice and have no hesitation in going before a jury and claiming a verdict. I am not sure that we could not go further. I am not very fresh from my reading of Blackstone, Starkie, and some of the older authorities, but if I recollect, I think it is in Starkie on Evidence, probably, in reference to criminal cases, the rule is laid down that the evidence must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of the guilt of the prisoner but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis. I think the evidence here is not only consistent with the hypothesis of a contract, but it seems to my mind to be inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis. Therefore, applying the rules in a criminal case to it, I think we should convict the defendants, the parties to the contract.

I think I can see in the sedate manner and grave appearance of some of my friends on the other side of this Chamber that they feel they are a little in the condition of the man who caught the wolf. After scuffling with it a good while he called upon his friends to come and help him let it loose. Or it may be that you are a little nearer the condition of the man who won the elephant at a raffle. He got him, but he did not know what to do with him, and he was in great trepidation about it. You have won the elephant in this case, and it seems to me you are not in very good condition to get rid of him, for if you do not stand by his friends and elect them to office he may turn upon you and rend every chairman of you, and turn you all off from the heads of the committees.

Possibly I am wrong about that. It may be that you are in the better condition of the astronomer who looked through his telescope at the moon, and after gazing at it for a time he told his friends that he saw a large elephant upon the surface of the moon. His friend said, "That is impossible." The astronomer looked again. "Yes," said he, "there is a large elephant on the surface of the moon; I not only see it, but I saw it move just that minute." His friends gathered around him then and there was great excitement, and it was a very great problem how it could have come there or why it had never been seen before. At length some one looking carefully found that there was a mouse between the lenses of the instrument, and it turned out that instead of having found an elephant on the surface of the moon, the astronomer had a mouse in his telescope. [Laughter.] I think it is possible that my friends on the other side have not the elephant they think they have caught. I believe they could let him loose, and possibly in the end it would turn out instead of a huge elephant to be the diminutive form of a little mouse.

I know the condition may be somewhat embarrassing, and I do not wish to see our friends on the other side embarrassed. But this peculiar coincidence, this strange state of things that has come along here, that nobody can account for, that made our friends over there the chairmen of the different committees that are generally given to the majority, that gave them the control of the committees and business of the Senate, that gave the Senator from Virginia the chairmanship of the committee he desired, that put him on several other important committees, that was followed by the nomination of his friends, one of them a democrat, for these offices—I say this strange coincidence may be and doubtless is somewhat embarrassing, and I sympathize with our friends in their embarrassment, but I must still reiterate that we cannot afford to make ourselves parties to it, and while we dislike to submit to the personal inconvenience of remaining here, or to subject those on the other side to that inconvenience, we feel it is our duty to stay here whatever time may be necessary to prevent the consummation of what the public believe to be a bargain and sale, or at least to prevent the election of these caucus candidates who have been nominated under this strange coincidence.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] on this question.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) On this vote and all similar votes I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.] I make this statement in reference to all votes of this character that may be taken during the day.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. WALKER'S name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] to state that on this question he is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAYARD. My colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired on this question with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Frye,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McDill,	Rollins,
Conger,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Miller,	Sherman.

ABSENT—20.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Platt of Conn.,	Vance,
Butler,	Garland,	Plumb,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Gorman,	Saulsbury,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Teller,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we may have a vote on the resolution now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. BUTLER. I find upon the desk of the Secretary two resolutions, one introduced by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] and one by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] The one introduced by the Senator from North Carolina reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the condition of the Potomac River front of the city of Washington and of the navigability of said river, the effect of bridges across the same upon navigation, floods, and the health of the city, and report at the next session of the Senate what steps, if any, ought, in its opinion, to be taken in reference thereto; that said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, and, if necessary, to employ a stenographer.

I should like to inquire of my friend from North Carolina if he regards it as a matter of consequence to the health of the city that that resolution should be acted upon and passed?

Mr. RANSOM. Of course I do, or I should not have introduced the resolution. I was in hope that the Senate would have passed it before this time. I suppose the Senate will pass it at some time during the session.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask the Senator from Kansas in reference to his resolution. I find the following resolution submitted by him:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate at this session—

First. A list of all appointments, other than those in the Army of the United States, made in his Department from December 1, 1879, to March 15, 1881.

Second. Under what provisions of law said appointments have been made, the rate of payment per annum, and the amount paid to each person appointed.

Third. What changes, promotions, details, and transfers have been made within said period, with the reasons for such transfers and details from one bureau or division to another.

Fourth. What revocations of appointments and promotions have been made, if any, with dates thereof and reasons for the same, with copies of all official and personal correspondence and telegrams relating thereto.

Fifth. What clerks, if any, have received pay when not on duty, what clerks have had leave of absence, with or without pay, and for what reason, and for what length of time in each case.

Sixth. What reductions of salary have been made within said period, and why said reductions, if any, were made.

Seventh. What dismissals have been made, if any, and for what causes.

Eighth. What employés, if any, have been paid out of a "lapse fund," and how such fund was obtained.

Ninth. Whether any board or commission has been convened for the purpose of making or considering the subject of appointments in said Department, and, if so, of whom said commission was composed, and what duties it performed.

Tenth. Whether clerks and other employés have been paid lower salaries than were provided by the statutes authorizing their employments.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if it is his purpose to press that resolution on the consideration of the Senate, and ask that it be put upon its passage?

Mr. INGALLS. It has been customary when Senators offered resolutions of inquiry to allow the Senator offering such a resolution to take his own course in regard to the time when he would press it and when he would ask a vote of the Senate upon it; and if the Senator from South Carolina will kindly concede to me the right which never has been denied to any other Senator, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator claims that right, as a matter of course I shall not infringe upon it.

Mr. INGALLS. I supposed the Senator would not.

Mr. BUTLER. But regarding it as a matter of consequence, I was going to ask the Senator if he would not consent to allow the resolution to be put upon its passage now.

Mr. INGALLS. I prefer that it should not be acted upon now, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. That ends it, then. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAYARD. My colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller,	Teller.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Garland,	Plumb,	Vest,
Camden,	Gorman,	Saulsbury,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Vance,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at this session—

First. A list of all appointments, other than those in the Army of the United States, made in each Department from December 1, 1879, to March 15, 1881.

Second. Under what provisions of law said appointments have been made, the rate of payment per annum, and the amount paid to each person appointed.

Third. What changes, promotions, details, and transfers have been made within said period, with the reasons for such transfers and details from one bureau or division to another.

Fourth. What revocations of appointments and promotions have been made, if any, with dates thereof and reasons for the same, with copies of all official and personal correspondence and telegrams relating thereto——

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not in order. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts indefinitely.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Why is not the resolution in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending resolution.

Mr. DAWES. There is a pending resolution, and that is enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One resolution is pending.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have my resolution read for information.

Mr. DAWES. Pending the resolution that I offered, I object to the introduction of any other.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the resolution I offered been read through?

Mr. HOAR. Who has the floor? The Chair has not assigned it to anybody.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina had the floor, and offered a resolution which is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Massachusetts certainly has not the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes now the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. BUTLER. I simply rise to inquire whether the resolution has been read through or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not read entirely through.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that it be read for information; I believe there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made, and the reading was suspended.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that objection well founded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made an objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a right, it seems to me, to have the resolution read, and I have not yielded the floor to the Senator from Louisiana. I was proceeding——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolution be read for information.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator cannot have it read for information.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask that the Clerk send the resolution back, and I will read it myself. I do not yield the floor. I suppose I have a right to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is on the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I have offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at this session—

First. A list of all appointments, other than those in the Army of the United States, made in each Department from December 1, 1879, to March 15, 1881.

Second. Under what provisions of law said appointments have been made, the rate of payment per annum, and the amount paid to each person appointed.

Mr. DAWES. How many——

Mr. TELLER. What is the first item? Read it again.

Mr. BUTLER. The honorable Senators from Colorado and Massachusetts may read the resolution in the RECORD to-morrow. If the Senators will indulge me and not interrupt me I shall be obliged to them. I think that will be far more polite, if they will pardon me for saying so:

Third. What changes, promotions, details, and transfers have been made within said period, with the reasons for such transfers and details from one bureau or division to another.

Fourth. What revocations of appointments and promotions have been made, if any, with dates thereof and reasons for the same, with copies of all official and personal correspondence and telegrams relating thereto.

Fifth. What clerks, if any, have received pay when not on duty; what clerks have had leave of absence, with or without pay, and for what reason, and for what length of time in each case.

Sixth. What reductions of salary have been made within said period, and why said reductions, if any, were made.

Seventh. What dismissals have been made, if any, and for what causes.

Eighth. What employés, if any, have been paid out of a "lapse fund," and how such fund was obtained.

Ninth. Whether any board or commission has been convened for the purpose of making or considering the subject of appointments in said Department; and if so, of whom said commission was composed, and what duties it performed.

I have read the resolution for information, which I had the honor to offer, and I now move that the Senate adjourn in order to give my friend from Massachusetts an opportunity to digest the resolution, and I hope he will vote for it when it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Lamar,	Slater,
Coke,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Maxey,

NAYS—28.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Blair,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Frye,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Teller.

ABSENT—21.

Anthony,	Garland,	Platt of Conn.,	Vest,
Butler,	Gorman,	Plumb,	Walker,
Camden,	Hill of Colorado,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Davis of Illinois,	Jackson,	Vance,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Van Wyck,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, it is very certain that grave apprehensions exist over the country as to the effect of this alliance between the republican party and the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Riddleberger, I believe is his name, who has figured so largely here, and it is evidently extending to very respectable quarters. The impression seems to be that if the republican party once lets go its financial hold on the public faith which it claims to have held so tenaciously, there may be serious difficulty in carrying on the Government of the country; even the New York Times, which is a highly respectable paper, seems to have taken alarm. It says to-day in regard to the speech made yesterday by the Senator from Virginia:

The substance of the matter, so far as General MAHONE is concerned, seems to be that he is not a repudiator, because he proposes that the State should pay a part of its just debts. The refusal to pay the remainder is not, he says, repudiation, but readjustment. The explanation is feeble. The bill which the Mahone party in Virginia succeeded in passing a year ago (March 1, 1880) reduces the recognized principal of the debt to $20,000,000, i. e., it cuts off half. But it does cut off that much absolutely, and, moreover, it reduces the interest to 3 per cent., makes the bonds taxable, deprives the coupons of the privilege of being received for taxes, and abolishes the sinking fund provided by law for the payment of the debt. In other words, it reduces the maximum amount of principal which in any event can be got by the creditors, and then by an elaborate series of injurious provisions reduces the money value of the obligations which are acknowledged. In addition to which it must be remembered that such trickery with the credit of the State in itself depreciates its bonds. It is only a modest estimate of the effect intended by this bill that it cheats the creditor of at least one-half his due. If this is not repudiation, then a man is not a thief who robs you of one-half the contents of your pocket-book and leaves you the other half.

That is from the editorial column of to-day's issue.

Mr. DAWES. Will not the Senator read on?

Mr. BECK. Now, all I propose——

Mr. DAWES. Why do you stop there?

Mr. BECK. As grave alarm obviously exists in the minds of highly respectable people, and as the contagion may spread so that it may involve the Senator from Massachusetts after a while, and he may take up the view that it is honest to do what the Riddleberger bill proposed, and as we have a committee I think peculiarly well constituted to stamp out all these diseases—I do not mean the pleuro-pneumonia committee, for I believe that was dissolved when the present Secretary of the Interior was taken from us—I shall move to refer this resolution to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, to see if they cannot devise ways and means to stamp out this repudiation mania which has taken such a deep hold on the republican party, and upon the motion for that reference I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. And I ask the floor on that motion for a moment.

Mr. BECK. I want to get a vote if I can on the motion to refer.

Mr. CONKLING. It is debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor, I believe. The Senator has made his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is not now in order.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I have not sat down, but I will.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BECK. I give it up.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state his question of order.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire of the Chair why the motion of the Senator from Kentucky is not in order?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not a question of order.

Mr. HARRIS. Then it is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there not a motion to postpone indefinitely pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to postpone indefinitely takes precedence of the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to refer.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not in order to move to refer pending that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the only reason.

Mr. BECK. I will make the motion after the present motion is acted on.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, it seems too bad that the article to which the Senator from Kentucky called attention, and which so impressed him, should be cut off in the middle. I think that it is due to the author of the article, as well as the Senator from Kentucky, that what impressed him and aroused him so much to struggle against, the truths contained in this article, should appear in the RECORD alongside of what he has read, and therefore, as a part of my own speech, I read, beginning where he left off:

But the aggressive portion of General MAHONE'S speech was effective. He showed by the record—

This is what I should like to have my friend hear—that the men who had accused him of sustaining dishonesty in the treatment of the debt had connived at similar but worse offenses in their own States; and in addition he made a very pointed attack on the tendency shown by the democratic party toward repudiation of national obligations.

I do not wonder that my friend from Kentucky was stirred to the very bottom of his soul when he came to read this article.

If he did not show that there was no mote in the eye of the Virginia readjuster, he brought out plainly the existence of a considerable beam in the eyes of his assailants.

Among them is the Senator from Kentucky.

He also charged that the Bourbons of Virginia, "while openly professing obedience to the Constitution, held by mental reservation purposes hostile to the Constitution," and that they "had undertaken by methods of indirection to disfranchise the colored man." For his part, he "had never given that doctrine his assent, either in public or at the ballot-box."

I hope the Senator from Kentucky is not so disgusted as to refuse to hear this.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is only another coincidence; go on.

Mr. DAWES. The article proceeds:

He "wanted no political serfs in Virginia." He was prepared to "assure the country that in Virginia, at least, there should be a free suffrage—a priceless suffrage—a full vote and an honest count." Thus, General MAHONE has a second time deliberately, and with greater emphasis than before, drawn the line between his party and the democratic organization in Virginia precisely at a point at which the latter is divided from the republicans. There is no denying the significance of this fact. The democratic organs choose to ignore it, and to dwell only on the position of General MAHONE with reference to the State debt. We do not conceal our disapproval of the latter, but we rejoice that a man of courage and political influence, and with a strong following, has been found among the democratic leaders of a Southern State to take issue with his party on the question of equal suffrage. It is the beginning of the end. Bad as is the doctrine for which General MAHONE has sought negro votes, the fact that he has sought them, that he is ready to expose the purposes of his former associates to resist them, is a hopeful sign. Once recognize the right of all the voters in the South to the actual use of the ballot and the questions to the solution of which the ballot will be applied must ultimately be settled with reasonable justice.

That is all, Mr. President, at this time. If the Senator from Kentucky finds any more in this editorial that he would like to call attention to, there are other significant passages to which I will commend his attention.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I was not dealing with Mr. MAHONE, and never have in what little I have said. He has gone over to the other side, as he had a right to do, and as he says, and I have no right to dispute his word, that there was no particular bargain made with him. Let him stay there. What I have been endeavoring to show is that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in taking up Mr. Riddleberger, who was an avowed repudiationist, as the New York Times admits and proves, who introduced and passed the bill which it justly says was as honest as it would be for a man to take half your money and leave you the other half and still claim to be an honest man, is making a great mistake. He is made the organ of the republican caucus to indorse him and place him in power without any bargain with MAHONE. Merely for the love they entertain and because of the admiration they have for the principles of Mr. Riddleberger, they propose to make him Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of this Senate as a reward for the faithful services he had rendered the republican party. There is no bargain about it, MAHONE says; although he was a confederate brigadier, was a Hancock elector, and a repudiator, still such is the love and affection of the republican caucus for that class of men that the Senator from Massachusetts has taken him up, and all executive business has to be suspended, everything must come to a stand-still, the Supreme Court may adjourn without a quorum, the great offices of the country remain unfilled, the public business must suffer, because we cannot take a day even to go into executive session before Mr Riddleberger shall be rewarded for the great and meritorious services he has rendered!

The Senator from Virginia said yesterday, he had to admit, I suppose, with sorrow, that the statement I read the other day was true that Riddleberger had sought to expel from the Legislature an honest, simple-minded, debt-paying negro member, who could not vote in Massachusetts; he would have been a serf there because he could not read or write, perhaps, or sign his name. Riddleberger is a hero in republican eyes for seeking to expel him as a nuisance because he sought to pay the debt. That adds, no doubt, great luster to the action of the caucus and its nominee.

I dismiss the Senator from Virginia; I have nothing to do with him or Riddleberger and those little fellows. The time was when I was a boy and followed the organ around—and the Senator from Massachusetts seems to be the great organ-grinder of the caucus now—then I watched the monkey that danced about with a collar around his neck and looked handsome in his fine clothes as he picked up the pennies, and I thought he was the great factor in the case; but I learned after awhile that the man who turned the organ controlled the business and held on to everything; that he was indeed the real man of the concern. I do not think that is good kind of work for the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I do not propose to help him place in high position here a man like Riddleberger or any of these repudiating fellows. The Senator from Massachusetts should look round for somebody else. I want to persuade him to quit that business and not be keeping the Senate here day after day and the country agitated any longer merely to get a few pennies by this performance for the benefit of Mr. Riddleberger or anybody else who has occupied such a position.

While I am on my feet I want to say another thing. I looked into the trial of the Donnelly and Washburn case, in the other House, last winter, in order to keep up with what was going on. The Senator from Massachusetts takes pains to propose another man who I am not in a great hurry to put into place and power as Chief Clerk of this Senate; a man by the name of Charles W. Johnson, of Minnesota. I am opposed to him, if for no other reason than this: on the 19th of September, 1878, before the democrats came into power in the Senate, he, as chairman or secretary of a republican committee in Minnesota, issued this pronunciamiento:

MINNEAPOLIS, September 19.

SIR: The congressional committee, charged with laboring for the success of the republican cause in this district, call with confidence (so) upon you, as a republican, for such a contribution in money as you may feel willing to make, hoping that it will not be less than $—.

The committee deem it proper, in thus speaking to republicans, to remind them of the importance of the impending campaign. That the United States Senate is to be democratic after the 4th of March, 1879, is very nearly certain.

Recollect this was in September, 1878. The Senator from Massachusetts thought the other day that nobody knew two years ago, when we turned out a few men, until a week or two before they were turned out, that there would be a democratic Senate, and that they would lose their places, and he quarreled a good deal with the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] because he ventured to remark that they had known it for nearly a year before. Mr. Johnson, on the 19th of September, 1878, knew it, and tells the republicans in a circular that the United States Senate is to be democratic after the 4th of March, 1879.

Mr. DAWES. That is not what he says, or you read it wrong a moment ago.

Mr. BECK. "That the United States Senate is to be democratic after the 4th of March, 1879, is very nearly certain."

Mr. DAWES. "Very nearly certain" you then left out.

Mr. BECK. I beg your pardon. I never leave anything out when I read. I have not the habit of some others in that regard.

Mr. DAWES. You succeeded admirably the first time you tried.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Massachusetts will contain himself with patience a little while, I will read him more:

In view of this, the election of a democratic House of Representatives would precipitate upon the country dangerous agitations which would inevitably add to the present distresses and burdens. Among these schemes is the intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office, the payment of the rebel claims and war debt, the payment of the full value of all emancipated slaves, and the unlimited issue of irredeemable paper currency in place of the present redeemable paper money, which was issued by authority of a republican Congress, and by the same party has been sustained, thereby preserving the national honor and credit.

We have had that democratic House and we have had that democratic Senate, and the country knows, the Senator from Massachusetts knows, that every charge made by this man Johnson was absolutely false. He sent this circular, he says, to fifty men, got money from nearly all of them, and what more does he do? Mr. Bernard Cloutier appeared before a justice of the peace and swore that Johnson gave him $30 at one time and $20 at another as one of the operators in the Washburn election. Another man swears—Mr. William R. Metcalf—that Johnson gave him $15:

I presume that my name was handed to Charley Johnson and he paid me the money personally two days after election. When I got that money there was not a thing said except that I went in there and gave him my name, and he paid me. I do swear that not a word was said of political matters at the time I received the money.

Mr. CONKLING. What money? I did not hear the statement.

Mr. BECK. Money to use in the election, or as pay for work, (so called.) The committee, a majority of it, made a report to the House. I shall read a short sentence from that; they said it was Mr. Washburn's money.

Mr. DAWES. What did the democratic House do with that report?

Mr. BECK. I do not know. Here is the majority report.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the Senator know what they did with it?

Mr. BECK. I do not.

Mr. DAWES. I guess nobody does.

Mr. BECK. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts would know if anybody would, if there was anything wrong about it.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly. That is what I want to look at it for.

Mr. BECK. Did they repudiate it? Ask Riddleberger what was done with it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him whether or not General Washburn was seated by the democratic House on that report?

Mr. BECK. Very likely. Men have been seated many times where fraud has been committed.

Mr. McMILLAN. The democratic House having charge of that report and to which the report was made was satisfied that all the declarations made there injurious to General Washburn or the republican committee of the district were without foundation and false.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Johnson himself admitted that he issued that circular, which he knew was wholly without foundation in fact. Is that a qualification for Chief Clerk of the Senate?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not speaking of the circular, but of the fact.

Mr. BECK. It is admitted that it was a slander on the democratic party when he issued it and sent it out, and he knew it. Do you desire me to say that I will consent to see made our Chief Clerk a man who thus slandered this side of the Senate and who was handing out Washburn's money for corrupt electioneering purposes? Here is a little more:

Mr. Edward A. Stevens——

Mr. McMILLAN. If we are——

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. There is more of this. You will be a good deal wiser if you would listen a little longer.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. Edward A. Stevens, among other things, swears:

Q. Did you undertand that Charles W. Johnson, chairman or secretary of the republican district committee, complained the day after the election that he had a great number of parties coming to him to be paid, with whom he himself had made no contract, for money for votes or influence or work for Washburn at the polls?

(Objected to as immaterial.)

A. At that time my office was in the same building with that of Mr. Johnson. In passing down the stairs on the day following the election, or perhaps the next, I met a gentleman, I believe it was Mr. W. P. Roberts, who said, substantially, "You ought to hear Charley Johnson swear; there is a big crowd down below after their pay, and Charley says, 'Major Hale can pay his own hounds. I have all I can do to pay those I hired myself.'"

That is Charles W. Johnson, the gentleman who is proposed to be our Chief Clerk. Somebody seemed to have found fault with the statement that Charley Johnson swore, but there was no doubt about the money part:

Q. Is Mr. Charles W. Johnson, of whom you spoke, a member of some church in this city of good standing?

(Objected to on the ground that it is a little astute.)

A. Since the Beecher-Tilton controversy, I have been in doubt as to what the term "good standing" means. As to Charles Johnson's membership I know little, seeing him as often at Harmonia Hall and so-called low dances as I do at church. I understand that he is claimed as one of the dwellers at the Tabernacle.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator now will be careful in reading the testimony, because he is reading of a very respectable citizen of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt of it; and a very good political wire-worker, I have no doubt.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator does not intend to do any injustice to him. I hope he will be careful as to the testimony he reads there, and read it frankly and fully.

Mr. BECK. I will furnish the document to the Senator. Here is the report, signed by five very respectable gentlemen, members of the House of Representatives, a majority of those who had charge of the subject, Mr. Van H. Manning, Mr. S. L. Sawyer, Mr. R. F. Armfield, Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, and Mr. W. G. Colerick. In their report to Congress they say:

Johnson wanted Cloutier to go out and electioneer for Washburn. Cloutier said he would do so if he was paid for his time and expenses. Thereupon Johnson told him to start out. The next day Johnson met Cloutier at the post-office and paid him $30. The following Wednesday Cloutier met Johnson again at Washburn's office. "I told him I wanted some more money. He asked me how much I wanted, and I told him I wanted $20. He [Mr. Johnson] went into the next room and commenced talking with Mr. Washburn, [the sitting member.] He came back and handed me $20."

And they go on and give a great many other instances of Mr. Johnson's efficiency as an electioneerer and show how the election was being worked up. I am therefore, as to this gentleman who is embraced in the resolutions of the caucus, in no great hurry to vote without further time to examine whether he is a fit man to be Chief Clerk of the Senate, in view of the record that is here. He may be; if he is, a little further time for investigation would not hurt. He may be as respectable as the Senator from Minnesota says he is.

This testimony and this majority report would indicate that we are to place simply republican electioneerers, men who are adepts in running party machinery, in the high offices of this Senate. I think we had better look a little further into Mr. Johnson's case before we put him in. I do not doubt his respectability, I know there are very many respectable men who use money in elections; but I do not think it is quite a good thing to select one of that class of men as Chief Clerk in this Senate after it is developed to be the truth that he is doing that sort of work as freely as he seems to have been doing in this case. We have lobbyists enough outside; and to get time to look into it further, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will allow me a word before pressing that motion?

Mr. BECK. If you will renew the motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will leave the gentleman to do that. I recollect very well the contested-election case of Mr. Washburn, for I had the honor to be a member of the House in the Forty-sixth Congress; and now that the Senator recalls it, I believe there was a report made against Mr. Washburn. I may call it perhaps a partisan report; but I remember also that the republicans in the House were quite willing to enter into a little debate on that subject if it was desired. I remember, too, sir, that not a human being in that House raised his voice for one moment, either in debate or upon a call for the yeas and nays, to sustain that report or to contest Mr. Washburn's seat. Indeed, now that I recall the case still further, there was no call of the roll. Nemine contradicente, the entire House let Mr. Washburn keep his seat, for nobody had any doubt whatever of his right; neither had the people of that district any question of Mr. Washburn's ability or integrity, for he went before them in the late canvass and was returned to the Forty-seventh Congress by nearly 13,000 majority.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky said he was like that little appendage to an organ-grinder that picked up little pennies and crumbs. The Senator is in the proper employment going around among the rejected matters of the House and gathering them up here for the entertainment of those who are engaged in the same business.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, in justice to Mr. Johnson, to whom the Senator from Kentucky has referred and who is a citizen of my own State, I desire to say that the investigation in regard to the election of Mr. Washburn, which was contested by Mr. Donnelly, was fully examined in the House; the allegations of bribery made by Mr. Donnelly were denied by democrats of our own State so fully and so flatly that the democrats in the House of Representatives could not stand upon the accusations for a moment. They were all refuted. The charges made by Mr. Donnelly, supported by Colonel Finley, you know became a part of the issue before this nation. Democrats of Minnesota were so ashamed of the charges that they would not support them for an instant, and in the House, as has been stated by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] the democratic party abandoned the charges as false and without foundation, and General Washburn's reputation and the reputation of the people of that congressional district was fully and abundantly sustained in the House of Representatives; and when the matter went before the people of our State in that congressional district, the question there was fully considered by the people and General Washburn was returned, upon that issue largely, by a majority of 13,000, emphatically contradicting and repudiating any such charges.

Mr. Johnson is a gentleman of excellent character. He has served faithfully as a citizen in advancing the interests of our State; he has served faithfully in the Army in defense of the country; he has been faithful and honorable in every position in which he has been placed, and he will be faithful here; and I am sure before he has closed his term, should he be permitted to enter upon it, as the Chief Clerk of this Senate, the Senator from Kentucky and every other Senator upon this floor will be gratified that they have had an opportunity of receiving his services.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, I do not want any shifting of issues. I have said nothing against General Washburn; nor did I say that General Washburn knew anything about this money that was paid out. I read the case at the time. Judge Flandrean, who was his counsel, spent much of his time with me while he was here. As far as I could see, I thought Washburn ought to have the seat from the beginning; I said so to the Senator from Minnesota and to the members of the House; but that is not the question. Every man who was working for him and spending money for him and writing slanderous articles on the democratic party is not to be vindicated because General Washburn was allowed to have his seat by a democratic House. We are in the habit of doing justice both in the House and the Senate. I think they did justice in that contest at that time in the House. But on the question whether or not this man Johnson, who may be as reputable as he is said to be, should be made Chief Clerk, in view of this testimony, I thought we had better adjourn, and take a little time longer to see whether he is that order of man or not. If he is, and you do elect him next December, perhaps—not much before—and if he is as clever a man as you say he is, I will endeavor to sustain him in the proper performance of his duties. To have time to look into the matter, I move that the Senate adjourn, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am temporarily paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	George,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Brown,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

Cockrell,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Vance,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, during the earlier hours of the day, and following the remarks made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON,] my colleague [Mr. JONAS] indulged in some remarks that seemed to me of questionable taste, and which justify, I think, my replying.

My colleague animadverted somewhat severely upon the course of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina in voting in my behalf at the session of Congress just closed, and in thus censuring the Senator from South Carolina my colleague took occasion to repeat what he has time and again stated with as little justification and, as I think, as little occasion for it as to-day, that I was not elected to this body, and that I do not represent the State of Louisiana.

My colleague doubtless feels disappointed that I was not unseated, and takes my retention in this body much to heart. I am well aware that he was elected upon that issue; at least, he so declared when he received the nomination of the caucus of the Legislature that chose him. He then, if my recollection serves me aright, stated that he would labor early and late to the end that the State of Louisiana should be represented by another than myself; and he has refused to be comforted because he was not able to see that result accomplished. I bethink me that but a few days since I picked up a paper published in Louisiana, not republican, referring to the fact that my colleague had spent two years in the endeavor to unseat me, and after referring in somewhat complimentary terms to the service I had, as they were pleased to say, rendered the State during a previous term in this body, called the attention of my colleague to the fact that he had done nothing during his term for the State of Louisiana except to endeavor to unseat me, and that, so far as any record he had been able to make was concerned, they were compelled to say that the State of Louisiana, or at least the democratic party, had in him heretofore no representative on this floor.

Mr. President, I supposed when my colleague took the floor that it was for the purpose of replying to a statement made by the Senator from Virginia yesterday regarding the repudiation by the State of Louisiana of her public debt. I supposed that he would follow the example set him by the two Senators from South Carolina, and pursue the course intended to be pursued by other Senators on the other side, if I am rightly informed, in regard to the allegation made by the Senator from Virginia that the democratic party were responsible in the Southern States for the various acts of repudiation that those States have been guilty of. I supposed that my colleague would attempt at least to vindicate the democratic party of Louisiana, and that he would naturally endeavor to show that the debt repudiated by that State represented the fraud and corruption of the so-called carpet-bag or republican governments of that State. That would have been an issue in point, I submit. It would have been an issue upon which I would gladly have met him, and will joyfully, I may say, now or hereafter meet my colleague. For, sir, no more inexcusable, no more unjustifiable, no more altogether unprecedented and even rascally act—if I may use the expression in this body—of repudiation was ever perpetrated than that perpetrated by the democratic party of Louisiana in regard to the debt of that State.

Sir, upon that question and upon the question how that debt originated and whether it represents fraud or corruption, and if it does, which party is chargeable with that fraud and corruption, I am ready now and hereafter to meet my colleague or any other Senator. So far as one Southern State, and that the State I have the honor in part to represent, is concerned, the record made by the republican party, at least while I was governor, will bear the closest scrutiny. The hour is late, and I do not desire to go into that question in detail to-night. Some time in the not distant future I may feel myself justified in doing so. I repeat, sir, that I was surprised that my colleague did not pursue the course that I have indicated. I was surprised that he should content himself with a single remark or two covering one or two minutes of time, stating, after censuring the course of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] in regard to his vote in my case, that Louisiana was only represented on this floor by one Senator, alluding to himself.

Does my colleague desire that I should go into that question, a question that has not yet been discussed in this body? for bear in mind that the discussion in regard to my right to this seat has turned entirely and exclusively heretofore upon alleged improper practices—falsely alleged, as I aver, and for a purpose—in procuring my election; but never has there been a discussion upon the question as to whether the members of the Legislature of Louisiana that chose me to this position represented a majority of the people of that State, or whether the assemblage that chose the gentleman now here as my colleague, a Legislature chosen under the Nicholls government that succeeded the Packard government, represented a majority of the people of the State. Does my colleague desire me to enter that arena? Does he wish me to travel over that bloody record? And does he wish me to invoke the proof, manifold on every hand and irresistible, showing the mode and the manner by which the majority of the voters of Louisiana in 1876 and in 1878 were suppressed; how the party I represent, born in tribulation under the reconstruction acts of Congress and baptized in blood for years, was overthrown by violence and by fraud, by open corruption and bribery?

Sir, had I time I would go into that question, and I would show you that I represent a majority of the people of that State, numbering at least fifteen thousand. I think I could do it by proof that would be regarded as conclusive, but time will not permit me to-night.

I had intended to refer to the report of certain officers of the United States Army touching the election of 1876, showing the bloody record made by the democratic party that year. It is a touching and horrible history. I need not depend upon evidence taken before the returning board or by the agents of the returning board, but I rely upon the unbiased and impartial official reports of officers of the United States Army scattered over six or eight of the large republican parishes. The suppressing of this republican vote only enabled the democratic party prima facie upon the returns to claim a majority in that State. It would be upon the evidence of these Army officers and upon their reports on file in the Department of War alone that I would depend to show the justice of my claims. I will even venture to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments, as illustrative of the nature of this proof, and ask the Secretary to read from the report and from the statement of H. M. McCawley, first lieutenant Thirteenth United States Infantry, as a specimen of the means and the methods by which the vote of one large republican parish, namely, Ouachita, in 1876, returning two members to the Legislature and one senator, was overcome, though I had carried that parish in 1872 by a thousand majority over McEnery, my competitor, himself a resident of the parish, a parish where the colored vote is two to one as compared with the white vote. I ask the Secretary to read from the point I have marked. This is a report made by an Army officer in regard to the assassination of two colored clergymen, leading republicans of that parish.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I was sent with Mr. Hardy to see that he arrived safely at Logwood's, as it was then feared that persons going in that direction might be shot down by some assassin. My command consisted of eight men and non-commissioned officer. It was about ten o'clock p. m. when we arrived at Logwood's house. After innumerable stoppages in Chuville Swamp, it being very dark at the time, we were compelled to carry a lantern to see through the swamp or woods. Upon arriving at Logwood's, the sight was indeed appalling, and one which will never be erased from my memory—helpless women, frightened men, and children all huddled together in groups, looking terror-stricken, as though about being led out to be slaughtered; a few more surrounding a camp-fire which was burning to enable them to keep warm. In the passage-way of the front house was Primus Johnson, who lay there with the blood oozing from his wounds, which caused his death. In the rear of the house, or kitchen, Logwood was in bed, with at least eight or ten men and women surrounding his then supposed death-bed. The district attorney, Mr. Hardy, took his declaration, and, from all I could learn, two white men, who were blackened, committed this atrocious deed, and were supposed to be then on the lookout to return and finish their fiendish work, which had only been partly accomplished. I have seen many sad, sad sights, but the expression upon the faces of those helpless ones that night protrayed all that fright could possibly do; and when we had finished our business and about leaving, the supplication of those poor creatures was heart-rending, fearing they, as well as Logwood, would be murdered. I therefore left a detail of three men and a corporal of my own company to protect Eaton Logwood, his wife, and Mrs. Primus Johnson, at all hazards, and not to permit any one to enter the premises without permission from Logwood's wife or Mrs. Primus Johnson. The detail remained there for one week or more, and returned to the camp when Logwood was removed to the city of Monroe for safety. My impression was and is that the colored people thought they were killed and shot for their political opinions, both being known as strong republicans, particularly Logwood, who was a property-owner, and who had great influence with those of his own color. The effect, therefore, upon them (those colored people) was to drive those who were republicans into joining democratic clubs, for the purpose of avoiding a like calamity befalling them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I need only add that the man who was so severely wounded was taken to New Orleans, recovered sufficiently to give his testimony before a committee of the House of Representatives, and a few days afterward relapsed and died from his wounds. He sleeps in that city; but all over the State, on the banks of the Ouachita and of the Red River and in the swamps throughout that entire State, either lying upon the surface of the earth or buried under narrow hillocks, repose the bones of thousands of colored and white republicans who were slain in order to overcome the legitimate republican majority in that State and enable my colleague to say that he, and he alone, represents Louisiana on this floor.

Mr. President, I have but glanced at the question of fraud and violence in 1876. I now want to say a word or two in regard to the election of 1878. I have before me a journal; it is the journal of the Legislature of Louisiana. This journal contains the roll-call of the Legislature that chose my colleague. I turn to the vote cast for him by the members of the senate and the house, and I find that he could not have been elected except that representatives from certain parishes, republican heretofore, had voted for him. I find that he was voted for by three members from the parish of Caddo; and I see before me the honorable Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] who, with several other Senators, took testimony in regard to the election of 1878. There are three members and one senator from Caddo. How were those members elected? The honorable Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] will recollect the testimony produced before them in regard to the manner in which that election was conducted.

The three democratic members from Caddo Parish, who in the Legislature that elected my colleague voted for him, were chosen from a parish having about 4,000 colored voters and about 1,600 white; a parish that always had been republican since reconstruction whenever a fair vote was permitted; a parish that even in 1876 gave over a thousand republican majority, admitted to have given that majority on the face of the returns; a parish where, in 1878, (and it contains the second city of the State of Louisiana in population,) in order to carry the democratic ticket, the adherents and supporters of my colleague actually established, in direct contravention of law, two ballot-boxes at each poll; and in order to avoid the effect of the enforcement act, and the supervision of the supervisors appointed under that act, they compelled all the voters to put in a separate box the ballots cast for State officers and for members of the Legislature.

There is a gentleman now in this city, a planter well known by two or three Senators in this Chamber, who will tell you, as he told me, that to test the fairness of that election he stood at a poll held in a log-cabin near his plantation; that the colored people outnumbered the whites three to one, where there are less than one hundred white or democratic voters all told and about three hundred blacks; that he absolutely saw them vote; that he staid there until the polls were closed, when all but the commissioners of election were excluded from the room; and thereupon these commissioners, chosen by the police jurors, who were appointed by the governor; these commissioners constituted by law a returning board for their respective polls throughout the State of Louisiana, made a return of that poll reversing the actual result, and returned but about 60 republican votes and nearly 300 democratic votes, thus practically reversing the result at that poll. That is the way those men were chosen from Caddo Parish that voted for my colleague.

Take the parish of Tensas as another instance—a parish that numbers 3,500 colored voters against less than four hundred white. I have before me, but have not time to read from it, the message of Governor Nicholls in regard to the riots in that parish in 1878, that resulted in the election of two democratic members of the lower house from this strongly republican parish, in which Governor Nicholls admitted that the assault upon Fairfax, the colored republican leader and candidate for Congress, and the violence and intimidation that resulted in overthrowing the republican vote, were purely political and were entirely unjustifiable. Let me add that for this one act of candor Governor Nicholls was denounced by the Bourbon democracy from one end of the State to the other, and shortly afterward was legislated out of office, before the expiration of his term, by a constitutional convention, and virtually driven into political exile in Assumption Parish, where he now resides.

I mention these two parishes of Caddo and Tensas alone. But there are Concordia and Madison and several other parishes that I might refer to as showing that, eliminating from this record the votes cast for my colleague by democratic members from parishes that should have been represented by republicans, his competitor, Governor Warmoth, who was voted for by the republicans, would rightly have been elected in his stead.

Who will say that I do not represent the State of Louisiana? Sir, I represent a majority of the voters of the State of Louisiana, according to a registration taken under democratic auspices, as I said before, by from 15,000 to 20,000 majority. I not only represent those voters, but I represent men who pay taxes on more than $25,000,000 of property, men who represent the labor that cultivates and produces seven-eighths of the entire sugar crop of this country and five-eighths of the entire rice crop, men who pay seven-tenths of all the taxes of the State of Louisiana, paid during my administration and that of my predecessor taxes that enabled us to accumulate sufficient money to pay, and pay honestly, up to the last hour of my administration, the interest upon the public debt, and leave nearly two hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury, which the incoming democratic administration hypothecated and used to pay one installment of the public debt, and after that defaulted on the interest, and practically repudiated that and a large proportion of the principal.

Sir, I represent republican parishes the delinquent taxes of many of which were less than 5 per cent., while the delinquent taxes of the democratic parishes were in many cases over 60 per cent., and in some nearly 90 per cent. In fact the republican parishes of Louisiana have since the war paid seven-tenths or nearly of all the taxes levied. They have borne the burden of taxation. My republican constituents are hewers of wood and drawers of water now as in time past; but they are freemen, and they earned their right to the ballot and earned their right to be represented by me on this floor because they were loyal to the Union, because they enlisted as soon as they had the opportunity to do so to maintain the Union, because they fought side by side with the loyal white men of the North, because they marched with them side by side during the smoke and din and tempest of battle to the mountain of victory, and their black hands united with the white hands of the loyal North in unfurling to the breeze the banner of the stars and left it floating there forever from sea to sea. [Applause.] It is by that right, sir, that I stand here to speak for the colored people of Louisiana, who, after deducting from the census returns the foreigners not entitled to vote, constitute a large majority of the voters in that State. And I not only speak for them, sir, but I speak for 5,000,000 colored people of the South, represented by 800,000 legal voters.

This whole question of the elections in the South, and in Louisiana especially, is so illimitable a subject that I protest against its being made a mere feature in the debate which now occupies the Senate. To me it is a small question whether the persons holding the offices of Sergeant-at-Arms or Secretary of the Senate shall be changed now or at some later time. The question with me is whether we should not welcome into our ranks and identify with us the man [Mr. MAHONE] who represents a new departure, who is, as the Senator from Massachusetts so well said the other day, the avant-courier of a new order of things in the South. In him in his person is the embodiment of free suffrage, of honest elections, of a fair count. That whole question being centered in his person here, may well bring up for discussion the mode and methods by which the republican governments of the South have one by one been overthrown. Bring that question up; discuss that question; let the light shine in upon it and show that these governments (with perhaps one or two exceptions that I do not pretend to justify here or elsewhere) were honest in their administration and endeavored to build up a strong and respectable party and one that would bring honor to the South and honor to the republican party of the nation at large. Show that as you can; show it by the record and challenge contradiction; and show that the colored people wherever they have had the opportunity so to do, as in my State, have gradually emerged from the darkness of ignorance, and to-day are carrying the banner of citizenship and civilization full high; show that if they can but have their right to vote recognized and their votes honestly counted they would send a delegation of members to the other House; and this can be done in several of the Southern States, some of which can be made by a fair election as firmly republican as is the State of Massachusetts. We elected one Representative from my State from a district by more than six thousand majority at the last election, carrying almost every parish in the district.

Mr. President, let me say that I do not hesitate to go into the question of whether Louisiana is a republican State. I assert here to-day, and I ask Senators around me, in traveling upon the cars and in frequenting the thoroughfares of this great nation, to ask the planters whom they may chance to meet from Louisiana, to ask business men, first if they do not believe, as honest, fair-minded men, that the republican party in Louisiana has an honest and fair majority in that State. Ask them, moreover, if, as compared with the present administration of public affairs in the State, the administration when I was governor was not vastly superior in all respects to the present one; ask them these questions and ask them to reply as honest men; ask them finally if there ever has been a time since the State of Louisiana was admitted into the Union when disorder and corruption, dishonesty and misrule, ran rampant as they do to-day in that State. Sir, this is strong language, but it is language that I think you will find I am justified in using if you will question the candid and high-minded citizens, not partisans but business men, whom you may chance to meet.

Before I sit down (for I wish my colleague to have an opportunity to challenge any assertion that I may make) I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I would not refer to were it not for the remarks that fell from the lips of my colleague. I asked some time since if my colleague desired me to go into the question of the mode and method by which the republican government in Louisiana was overthrown by the election of 1876, and later by the election of 1878. I referred then to the overthrow of the Packard government. It is said that I do not represent a de facto or a de jure government, and it is in regard to that I desire to say a word.

It may be remembered that a commission went to Louisiana. The origin of that commission is well known. I have naught to say in regard to its influence or its labors, but I do desire to call attention to this, which is not denied in Louisiana, that but for the fact that money contributed by the Louisiana Lottery Company was used to disintegrate the Packard government the Nicholls government would not be in existence to-day. As a portion of the proof, which, if I had time, I could adduce in that regard, I desire to call attention to a passage in the debates of the constitutional convention of 1879, after the overthrow of the Packard government, in which certain delegates averred that fact to be true. Mr. Robertson, for instance, a democratic delegate from the great parish of Saint Landry, and one of the leading democrats of the State, urged that the charter of the Louisiana Lottery Company, then upon the statute-book, should be incorporated into the constitution of Louisiana, and that it be made a perpetual corporation. It was replied that that was an unprecedented thing; that the constitution of no State in the Union contained a charter of any institution, especially of one so questionable as was the Louisiana Lottery Company. Mr. Robertson said in the discussion that—

> He favored it for the reason that he was a democrat and that the present democratic State government was established with the money furnished by the Louisiana Lottery Company.

This was in the debate in the constitutional convention, bear in mind.

Mr. Robertson further said:

> It was sustained at Odd-Fellows' Hall by this money, and it was because of this that the senate of the Nicholls legislature had unanimously postponed consideration of the house bill abolishing the company upon his motion.

Then follows more discussion:

> That the money of the lottery company had sustained the Nicholls government in its hour of need, and the party recognized this service by indefinitely postponing the bill.

Further along he stated:

> That the democratic party was pledged to sustain the Louisiana Lottery, and that its monopolistic character alone had been combated.

He concluded by saying that—

> The Nicholls government owes its very existence to the Louisiana Lottery Company.

Sir, this constitutional convention actually incorporated a clause in the constitution making perpetual the Louisiana Lottery Company. That lottery is working to-day, the crank of which is turned by the man who fired first on Fort Sumter, and the tickets or prizes are plucked and distributed to the gamblers of the nation at large by the hand of the principal confederate leader who distinguished himself in raiding upon the loyal people of the Shenandoah Valley. That institution stands to-day irrepealable, as a part of the organic law of Louisiana; and the debates of the constitutional convention that framed that constitution and submitted it to the people bear undeniable and ineffaceable impress of the fact that this charter was put in the constitution because the Louisiana Lottery Company furnished the money requisite to disintegrate and overthrow the legal Packard government. Is not this a great moral spectacle?

Sir, that is one of the reasons why I do not represent a de facto government on this floor. That is the immaculate record left behind for all time by the democratic party of Louisiana; a party which, when they had $300,000 in their treasury placed to the credit of the interest fund, coolly, with the audacity of a highwayman, took it from the treasury, and in the language of the resolution "remitted it to the State" for the benefit of the members of the Legislature, and to pay them their per diem and mileage, and left the creditors of the State to go begging, and they have been in that plight from that day to this.

I have been desultory in my remarks because I could not well avoid it. I have taken a longer time than I intended. I can only justify myself on the ground that, as I stated in the outset, my colleague made an unwarranted and unjustifiable charge that I do not represent the State of Louisiana on this floor.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, there is an old and homely saying that "it is an ill bird that defiles its own nest." I do not expect to apply this proverb to my colleague, because it is doubtful whether his nest can be found in the State which he professes to represent. But he has at last sought the opportunity, which he could have had for the last two years, of pouring forth all the bile, all the malice, all the vituperation, and all the filth which has long been imprisoned in his heart against the people whom he says he in part has the honor to represent on this floor.

I am not going at this late hour of the evening and of this discussion to follow him through the evidence which has been procured by his party (majority or minority as it might happen to be) through the various investigating committees which have inquired into the elections held in Louisiana in 1874, in 1876, and in 1878. This evidence has been discussed upon this floor ad nauseam. It has been discussed upon the floor of the House. The reports of these committees have been before the people, and they have been ventilated both in this Chamber and elsewhere until every man is not only familiar with them, but disgusted with the consideration of what has been called Louisiana carpet-bag politics.

The honorable Senator has had four years in which to speak. He has had two years in which to answer the speeches which have been made here upon Louisiana politics and Louisiana history, and especially upon that part of its history covered with infamy, the period during which he presided over its destinies, pretending to be, and, through Federal aid, having the power to assert himself to be, the governor of its people.

I say that the garbled extract which he has read here to-day is one of the numerous slanders fulminated against the people of Louisiana by that string of witnesses whom he has long had in his pay and under his control, who testified for him at home, and whom he brought up here, some of whom came here to testify against him, but were prevailed upon to testify in his favor. This same string of witnesses, giving the same evidence, have again and again sought to fasten their calumnies upon the people of Louisiana, and again and again has their false witness been refuted by the testimony of the best and most reputable citizens of Louisiana of both political parties, whose testimony is to be found in the same reports from which he has quoted.

Mr. President, in every election since 1870 (and that election was a base fraud, and was so characterized by the then governor of the State, under whose auspices it was conducted) the democratic party have received a fair majority of the votes of the people of Louisiana. They carried the election in 1872 and elected John McEnery governor and a democratic Legislature, but the will of the people was subverted by the returning board and the instruments of the Senator. The returns actually made in the election were set aside, and he and his Legislature were counted into office without any election returns at all, without any evidence to support their pretended election, and in direct violation of the will of the people.

In 1874 the democrats again carried Louisiana, electing their State treasurer and electing a Legislature. Again was the will of the people subverted. Again did the Senator's returning board set aside the returns of the election as held at the polls and substituted for the votes of the people false and fraudulent returns, electing a republican treasurer and a republican Legislature.

So great was this enormity, maintained and supported as it was by the Army of the United States and by the then President with all the plenitude of his power—so great was this outrage considered that the committee of investigation sent to Louisiana to inquire into that election by a republican House, having on it a republican majority, reported that the return of the election was fraudulent; that the democrats had carried the election, and had elected the Legislature. That report was not only signed by the democratic members of the committee, but it was written by a distinguished gentleman whom I saw on the floor of the Senate only a few days ago, the present governor of Ohio, and it was also signed by the distinguished gentleman who has just been appointed to represent the United States at the court of Austria.

There was a minority report, signed by two gentlemen now Senators on this floor, and by the late Vice-President of the United States; but that minority report so little commended itself to the conscience of at least one of its signers that he lost no time in going back to Louisiana and seeking to repair the evil which had been done (and which he considered he had to some extent countenanced) by procuring a compromise to be made of the Louisiana Legislature, so as to give the democratic party a majority in the house of representatives, as they claimed had been elected.

I am not going into the details of the election of 1876, which was investigated by a Senate committee, which was investigated by a House committee, and which was investigated by commissioners sent down by both parties to participate in the count. I am not going to give a history of the returning board of 1876. I am not going to recount the episode of Eliza Pinkston; I am not going to bring to the witness stand Mrs. Agnes Jenks. I am not going to bring up the ignoble instruments in the fraud which was there attempted to be perpetrated; by which the vote of Louisiana was again to be stolen from her people under the same auspices, and a republican governor and a republican Legislature again installed where the people had given a democratic majority.

The honorable Senator professes to have come to the Senate as the result of that election, and he has remained in his seat, I care not to inquire from what cause. I rose to-day not to discuss this question over again. I said nothing against the Senator or the mode or manner of his election. I rose simply to disclaim for myself and for other Senators on this floor that it was owing to our magnanimity or our constitutional scruples that he occupied his place in this Senate. He was elected by no Legislature at all. Did we not sit here for two years while this matter was under consideration, and has a Senator risen on that side of the Chamber to vindicate his election? Has a Senator risen to contend that the Legislature which elected him was the proper and legitimate Legislature of Louisiana? He was elected, as the world knows, as every Senator sitting on this floor knows, by a mere mob, an unorganized body having no more right to elect and send a Senator here than any assemblage of persons gathered in a county meeting or political caucus.

He is here, and now that he finds himself here in safety, now that the Senate is equally divided, with a possible republican majority, he rises for the first time and waves the bloody shirt and introduces this class of political discussion, which he says he trusts he will never hear of again. He can vilify his people; he can slander the people whom he professes to represent; he can accuse them of assassination, of violence, of bloodshed, of disfranchising the voter at the polls, of making fraudulent returns of the election, but he trusts this will be the last time he will ever hear in this Chamber of such accusations. Does he expect them to meet with no reply?

He tells us, Mr. President, that in these charges which he makes against a brave people that he pretends to represent he is justified and backed by the best people in our community, the planter, the merchant, the tax-payer. It is needless for me to answer this assertion. The people of Louisiana have sent two distinguished gentlemen here claiming his seat. In all the length and breadth of the State there is no man, not even I believe belonging to the republican party, who conscientiously believes that my colleague was ever elected or has any right to a seat on this floor. The man cannot be named, the planter or merchant or capitalist or man of honor or man of character in Louisiana, who considers that the gentleman sits upon this floor as a fair representative of the people or who desires that he shall be maintained in his usurped prerogative.

As I said before, these are old, oft-told tales of slander and calumny. They have been refuted over and over again. I am not going to wade into the dirty depths from which they were produced again to examine and to criticise them. The elections in Louisiana are as free and as fair as they are in any of the States of this Union. The election in 1876, the election in 1878, and the election in 1880, (to which the gentleman did not allude,) where a democratic majority of 30,000 was polled for General Hancock, were as free and fair as any elections that were held in any State in the Union.

I cannot expect the Senator to do it, but gentlemen on the other side must cease to calculate on the color line; they must cease to say that the colored man is necessarily a republican and the white man a democrat. The fact is otherwise. A large proportion of the colored men in Louisiana belong to the democratic party and vote for the democratic candidates with the same alacrity and willingness as I do, and none know it better than the Senator himself. Their eyes were long enough blinded; they were long enough kept in the control of the republican party; they were long enough led by the nose and deceived, but they awoke from their dream. They awoke when, after long and hard fighting at the polls and by constitutional methods, the democratic party at length gained possession of the government of Louisiana, and the colored people found that they were not to be relegated into slavery. They found that they were not to be deprived of the benefits of their emancipation. They found that they were to be paid for their labor. They found that they were still entitled to all political privileges and would be maintained in them. They found that their children were to be educated. They found that their schools and their churches were to be maintained; and they found at last those blessings of liberty which they had sought in vain during the radical and carpet-bag administration of my State.

I say to-day, Mr. President, that there are no more prosperous, no better satisfied, and no happier set of laboring people on the face of the earth than the colored people of the State of Louisiana. They have to a large extent embraced the democratic party. And why should they not? They were reared among the people of the State; they were reared among the white people; they have grown up among them; they know them and understand them well. They may have been led to believe at one time that they got their freedom against the will and protest of the white people of the South, and feared that they might be deprived at some future day of their freedom; but conscious now that they will be maintained in all the rights which have been conferred upon them, they are to a large extent, and perhaps a majority, as much devoted to the success of the democratic party as I am, and vote that ticket at each recurring election, as I do.

Mr. President, I am not going into the discussion of the Louisiana State debt. The honorable Senator wonders that I did not rise in my seat to defend the State of Louisiana. Only to a limited extent is the debt of the State of Louisiana of any concern to the democratic party of the State—only that they constitute the tax-payers and have to pay it. The State of Louisiana went into the war owing comparatively a small debt. I have not the figures before me, and I never can carry them in my head, but I think the ante-bellum debt of the State of Louisiana, one of the wealthiest States in the Union, was only $5,000,000. The whole war debt was, of course, repudiated. It was repudiated by the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which prevented us from paying it even if we had desired. Immediately after the war a debt was contracted for levee purposes, to repair the damage which had been done during the war, in the course of which nearly all the levees of the Mississippi River had been destroyed.

This constituted the whole indebtedness of the State of Louisiana at the time when the carpet-bag government was inaugurated. The debt was then, I think, under $10,000,000. Under the carpet-bag auspices, under the beneficent government of Warmoth and Kellogg, that debt was increased to upward of $20,000,000—to about twenty-three million dollars.

For this debt what consideration had the people of Louisiana? Not a railroad was built, not a levee was permanently built, not a public improvement was made. Bonds were issued, and the interest was ground out of the people, and the money was squandered—I care not to inquire by whom it was squandered—by those who issued the bonds and levied the taxes.

The debt, as I said, was about twenty-three million dollars, when during the administration of my colleague, with a republican Legislature, and under his sanction, arbitrarily and without the consent of a creditor, the debt was shaved 40 per cent., and new bonds were issued at sixty cents on the dollar for all the bonded indebtedness of the State of Louisiana, good, bad, and indifferent.

That was the only act of repudiation, if it was an act of repudiation, which has been committed. The administration of my colleague lopped at one fell swoop 40 per cent. of the indebtedness, and told the creditors of the State they could take bonds at 60 per cent. or get none at all. If this had not been done, it is possible and probable that when the democratic party came into power they might have inquired into the origin and validity of this debt. They might have shouldered what they knew was legitimate and valid, and they might have inquired what was the consideration for six, ten, or twelve millions of fraudulent indebtedness. But the funding bill destroyed the identity of the indebtedness; it converted the ante bellum debt and the reconstruction debt into similar bonds. It was impossible to distinguish the debt when the bonds had passed out into the market and had lost their identity, and no one could tell which bonds had been issued for the valid debt of the State and which bonds had been issued for the invalid and illegal debt. Therefore, no question has ever been made by the people of Louisiana.

These bonds bore 7 per cent. interest in the plenitude of the munificence of that State government of which my colleague boasts so much. These bonds being in the hands of himself and his friends, he made them bear this interest at a time when the Government of the United States was paying 4 and 4½ per cent. in order to borrow money, and when no State that was settling its indebtedness was issuing bonds to bear more than 4, 5, or 6 per cent.

Under his beneficent rule the people of the State had become poor, broken down, exhausted, and deprived of every resource. He may have left a paltry pittance in the treasury; he left nothing in the hands of the people. In that very book, the report of the Teller committee, it is shown that in one parish, the parish of Natchitoches, the people paid 8¼ per cent. taxes per annum. He may have ground out the money to pay the interest on these bonds, but I say he left nothing in the hands of the people. The people were unable to pay this interest; they were unable to pay the grinding taxes, amounting, municipal, parish, and city, to about 2½ per cent. as an average through the whole State, and in some parishes to 3 and 4 per cent., until they culminated in Natchitoches in 8 per cent.

I was not a member of the constitutional convention of Louisiana, and of their action I do not express any opinion, although it has been indorsed and approved by the people. They never cut down the principal of the debt, immoral and illegal though much of it was, a single copper. My colleague stated that we cut it down somewhat in the principal. Not a copper. Finding that they were unable to investigate it, they shouldered their cross. Finding also that in the impoverished condition of the country, in the reduced values of property, they were unable to pay the interest, they adopted and affirmed the whole debt as it existed according to the funding bill passed by the Legislature under the administration of my colleague, but scaled the interest, providing that for the first few years 2 per cent. interest should be paid, for the next 3 per cent., and for the remainder of the time till maturity 4 per cent. interest, and that new bonds should be issued in exchange for the old ones bearing these different rates of interest.

That is all my State has done with the debt, exaggerated as it was over 50 per cent. by fraud, bad government, and malfeasance. That is better than has been done by most other communities so despoiled and impoverished; far better probably than the people of Louisiana were able to undertake. It was no measure of repudiation. As I have said here before, the people of Louisiana would have been justified in repudiating a large portion of their debt had they been able to investigate and inquire into it, but the measures taken by my colleague while governor prevented an identification of the debt, and thus prevented it from being scaled. It was put in the market without any earmarks upon it, and we were prevented from doing anything but what we have done—submitting the question to the holders of the bonds whether they will graduate and scale the interest and take that interest which the people of Louisiana will be able to pay.

Mr. President, I repel with scorn what the honorable Senator has said about my election to the Senate. It has never been questioned at home; I challenge him to question it here. I received at the election when I was honored by being chosen a Senator the vote of my opponent, Governor Warmoth, the predecessor of Mr. KELLOGG. Deduct all the votes that he calls doubtful and I still would have been elected, having received the unanimous vote of the democratic party, which constituted over two-thirds of the Legislature. Not a member, however, cast his vote for me but was legally, fairly, and truly elected by the people and so returned, and the validity of their election has been vindicated since by the re-election of democrats in every parish that was then represented by democrats.

The honorable Senator speaks of the future of the republican party in Louisiana. He boasts that they have carried one district at the recent election. That was always a republican district. It gave a large majority for Packard at the time Packard was a candidate for governor. That district elected Mr. Acklen the first time on a contest, and the second time Mr. Acklen was elected because two republican candidates were running, one of whom, it is charged, was brought out by the custom-house for the purpose of defeating the regular nominee.

The Senators on the other side must not be deceived by the empty vaporing of the honorable Senator who does not believe himself a word that he says. Louisiana to-day is democratic on a fair vote, with every vote cast and every vote counted, by at least thirty thousand majority. I say her governor will be democratic, her Legislature will be democratic, her congressional representation will be democratic, and her electoral vote will be democratic as long as the democratic party gives proof that it deserves the support of a free people casting a free ballot and protecting that ballot for every man, white and colored, who may be entitled to cast it.

Mr. President, it will be strange news in Louisiana that the honorable Senator stands up here and avows himself the champion of a free vote and a fair count in the State of Louisiana. Connected as he has been with every fraud upon the ballot-box; connected as he has been with every fraud upon the returns; connected as he has been with every attempt to stifle and destroy suffrage in that State on the part of either white or colored men, his remarks will excite but a broad laugh of contempt and scorn throughout the length and breadth of the State which he says he represents, where he is so highly esteemed, and for whose people, tax-payers, rich and poor, white and colored, he here stands up to-day as the advocate. Heaven save the mark!

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate long, but I think it better to occupy the time now in reply to my colleague than to let the occasion go by. His remarks are fresh upon my mind and I can reply briefly.

A spectator in the galleries or upon the floor conversant with Louisiana matters would be astounded at much that my colleague has said. I am surprised myself, although I have been accustomed to his loose and questionable (if I may be permitted to say so) statements upon the floor of the Louisiana Legislature.

My colleague said, as I understood him, that the debt of Louisiana was very small when the war broke out.

Mr. JONAS. Between five and six million dollars, I said.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think my colleague said it was very small. I hold in my hand a tabulated statement of the debt of Louisiana when the war broke out. The ante bellum debt amounted to $10,157,882.12. The post bellum debt, the debt accumulated after the war under democratic auspices and by the Legislatures of 1865, 1866, and 1867, convened under the provisional government of Andrew Johnson, then President, amounted, up to the time when the republicans took charge of the government, in 1868, to $14,347,051.12.

Mr. DAWES. In addition to the ante bellum debt?

Mr. KELLOGG. No, including it. The democratic Legislature of 1866 and 1867, composed exclusively of white men, mostly ex-confederates, a Legislature which voted without one single dissenting voice to table the fourteenth constitutional amendment, although the then President, Andrew Johnson, sent a telegram through the governor beseeching them to adopt it, actually appropriated $14,000,000 over and above the revenues of those years. That is a matter of record.

My colleague says that that debt was greatly increased under Governor Kellogg and Governor Warmoth. I stand here to challenge that statement and say that neither my colleague nor any man living can put his finger upon any law passed during my administration approved by me authorizing the issue of one dollar of bonds or warrants that form a part now or at any time formed a part of the bonded or floating debt of Louisiana. My colleague cannot do it. I will give way if he will. Not a dollar of indebtedness can be pointed out as incurred under my administration. Still he tells you that the debt of the State largely originated under my administration. Why, sir, I reduced the debt; I reduced the taxes; and he knows it. He knows that when I went out of office I left money in the treasury to the credit of the interest fund. After paying the interest to Saturday at three o'clock I went out of office on Monday; and he knows that afterward under democratic rule the interest coupons of the bonds of Louisiana were hawked about the market at a nominal figure and that Louisiana has stood since in the markets of the world branded as a bankrupt and defaulter.

Still my colleague will stand up here representing the democratic party of Louisiana and a portion of the democratic party of this country, and give utterance to such a statement as that. It is something marvelous; something passing belief. Now, if I am wrong, I will give way to my colleague in order that he may correct me.

Mr. JONAS. How much was the bonded debt increased between 1868 and 1876?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will state it.

Mr. JONAS. I want to know.

Mr. KELLOGG. The debt was increased under Governor Warmoth's administration, not under mine, until it very nearly reached the constitutional limit fixed by the State in 1870 limiting the State debt to $25,000,000. The bonded debt alone was about $22,000,000.

When I went into office I found, not as the honorable Senator from Virginia stated yesterday—he probably got it from some print—that the debt was $41,000,000, but I found the actual bonded and floating debt between twenty-three and twenty-four million dollars. The excess that the democratic campaign documents during the last presidential campaign were wont to hold up to the country as the debt of Louisiana was the contingent liability authorized by acts passed largely by the democratic Legislatures of 1866 and 1867, not a dollar of the bonds authorized by these contingent acts ever having been issued, so that the entire debt was really between $23,000,000 and $24,000,000.

I found that to be the condition of things; I found that the State owed $60,000 to the interest fund; I found no money in the Treasury. The chief portion of that debt was incurred in the interest of the democratic party.

Sir, in reply to my colleague in the matter of funding the debt, believing the resources of the State would not justify its payment in full, I did recommend the passage of a bill and of a constitutional amendment, the latter to be submitted to the people at the next general election, authorizing the funding of the then debt, bonded and floating, at sixty cents on the dollar in a forty-year 7 per cent. bond; and the constitutional amendment submitted to the people provided that that bond should be a subsisting contract between each and every holder of these bonds and the State, which the State should in no wise impair, and that the judicial power might be invoked to enforce the payment of the bond, interest and principal, when the same fell due, and providing for the levying and collection of a separate tax of five and one-half mills to pay the interest upon these bonds; also limiting the State debt to the amount of these bonds. These constitutional amendments were adopted at the next general election, and never disputed—adopted by an undisputed majority of the votes of the State. We then said to the creditors throughout this country and in Europe, "Come forward and fund your bonds, because we have a constitutional amendment that will secure their inviolability; the State waives its sovereignty; even the democrats say they will pay it; they declare they will pay the bonds so issued." The chamber of commerce, the cotton exchange, all parties agreed to this.

The bondholders came forward and sent their committees from London and from New York. They came to Louisiana, and I showed them that in good faith we had submitted this funding proposition, and they brought forward their bonds, and when I left the office of governor over ten millions had been funded. The compromise was acquiesced in by the bondholders after an examination of the funding bill and of the constitutional amendment, with the guarantees that surrounded the bonds. They took the new bonds in good faith. I then went to New York before the governing committee of the stock exchange, and, after full examination, they decided that our funding was not an act of repudiation, and they placed those bonds upon the stock exchange of New York, where they had put few bonds of any other Southern State, and those bonds immediately went to seventy-five or eighty cents. That was in the year 1876.

It is needless to go over the history of this, except to say that I went out of office paying the interest on those bonds, but as soon as the democratic party got into office and procured possession of the State government under Nicholls, they immediately passed a resolution through their Legislature affirming and ratifying that issue of bonds. After appointing a committee, the speaker being chairman, and having a report laid before them saying that none but legitimate bonds had been funded by our board, they published that to the world, and the funding board, of which Governor Nicholls was president, stated to the world in a resolution published broadcast through this country and Europe that they would pay those bonds, principal and interest.

The supreme court of the State, composed exclusively of democrats, rendered an elaborate opinion, affirming the validity, binding effect, and constitutionality of the funding law and the constitutional amendment, and stating that these bonds were the legitimate debt of the State. More than all that, the executive department, the legislative, and the judiciary having ratified the validity of these bonds, Governor Nicholls sent to Europe and elsewhere a statement, signed by himself and the funding board and all the State officers, embodying the opinion of the supreme court that these bonds represented the honest debt of the State, the interest of which would be promptly paid whenever due. The bonds went immediately in New York and abroad to ninety cents and upward on the belief that now the oft-repeated argument would be illustrated and made a practical verity, that the white people, who had refused heretofore to pay taxes, would come forward under their own government cheerfully and pay them.

On the 1st day of July, 1877, the first interest accrued, amounting to between $300,000 and $400,000, and they took the money we had left to the credit of the interest fund, with money they had collected in the mean time, and paid the first installment of interest due in July, 1877; but in January, 1878, the State went to protest, and from that time on they have been defaulters in all the markets of the world. Then the Legislature went to work and hypothecated all the interest that had been accumulated under the funding bill during the last six months of that year, and gravely appropriated it to their own use and then passed a bill authorizing the calling of a constitutional convention.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was that the interest accruing?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; the interest tax of five and a half mills provided by the funding bill. When the constitutional convention met, no interest having been paid in the mean time, they went to work gravely, and a committee of democrats proposed to repudiate all but about five million dollars of that debt; but Thomas J. Semmes, a democrat, and others, who represented large commercial and planting interests in the State, succeeded in procuring the adoption of a minority report which left the debt intact, with this proviso in substance, that the first five years the interest should be 2 per cent., and after that 3 or 4 per cent., or something of that kind, graduating it, and providing that no interest should be paid unless the holder of each and every bond came forward and allowed the treasurer to stamp on their bond a new contract. They not only repudiated all the money then to the credit of the interest fund and collected during that year, but they practically scaled the debt down 25 per cent., and scaled the interest down from 7 to 2 and 4 per cent.

Mr. JONAS. Does the Senator say that the ordinance passed by the convention scaled the debt?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will read the ordinance.

Mr. JONAS. That it scaled the debt 25 per cent.?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will read it, and then there will be no question.

Be it ordained, &c., That the interest to be paid on the consolidated bonds of the State of Louisiana—

Bonds that the democratic supreme court, the democratic executive, and the democratic Legislature had ratified and declared valid and binding—be, and is hereby, fixed at 2 per cent. per annum for five years from the 1st of January, 1880, 3 per cent. per annum for fifteen years, and 4 per cent. per annum thereafter, payable semi-annually; and there shall be levied an annual tax sufficient for the full payment of said interest, not exceeding three mills, the limit of all State tax being hereby fixed at six mills: Provided, The holders of consolidated bonds may, at their option, demand in exchange for the bonds held by them bonds of the denomination of $5, $100, $500, $1,000, to be issued at the rate of seventy-five cents on the dollar of bonds held and to be surrendered by such holders, the said new issue to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

Mr. JONAS. There was an option there.

Mr. KELLOGG. An option—a rather severe option; the same option that a highwayman gives to his victim when he puts his pistol to his head and orders him to deliver.

Mr. BLAIR. What was the interest originally?

Mr. KELLOGG. Seven per cent.

ART. 2. The holders of the consolidated bonds may at any time present their bonds to the treasurer of the State, or to an agent to be appointed by the governor—one in the city of New York and the other in the city of London—and the said treasurer—

Now, note this. I see the ex-Secretary of the Treasury before me, and I am sure he will appreciate this kind of financiering—and the said treasurer or agent, as the case may be, shall indorse or stamp thereon the words, "Interest reduced to 2 per cent. per annum for five years from January 1, 1880, 3 per cent. per annum for fifteen years, and 4 per cent. per annum thereafter:" Provided, The holder or holders of said bonds may apply to the treasurer for an exchange of bonds, as provided in the preceding article.

They may exchange, or, in order to get their interest, submit to a defacement of the face of the bonds by a stamp that changed the original terms of the bonds to a lower rate of interest. Now, Mr. President, here is the cap-sheaf of all. What I am about to read is, I think, sufficient to make the legislative body that adopted it a by-word and a hissing among all honest, intelligent men; and I think I do not use too strong language. Bear in mind, now, that they had not paid the interest falling due January 1, 1878, and had collected a large amount to the credit of the interest fund during 1880.

Be it further ordained, That the coupon of said consolidated bonds falling due the 1st of January, 1880, be, and the same is hereby, remitted, and any interest taxes collected to meet said coupon are hereby transferred to meet the expenses of the State government.

They transferred the money in the hands of the treasurer to the credit of the interest fund that belonged to each and every coupon-holder in Amsterdam, London, and New York to their own pockets. They just transferred it to the credit of the general fund to defray the expenses of the State government. What was the result? The bonds went down at once to eighteen or twenty cents, and even more, I believe. Large business houses that I might mention had bought a large amount of these bonds. They purchased them immediately after the Packard government was overthrown. They purchased believing that the democracy would pay their taxes and would pay the interest on these bonds; but when this act of repudiation took place the bonds went down like lead on their hands. A prominent member of the national democratic committee asked me not long since what he should do with his bonds which he purchased at this time. I told him that I thought perhaps the interest reduced to 2 per cent. now due on those bonds might be paid; but if there was a series of crevasses or a failure of crops it might not be paid. He said he knew that well enough, and was going to sell them, "and," said he, "I give it to you as my opinion that a more rascally set of repudiators don't live in the world than the democracy of Louisiana, and you may tell them so for me." [Laughter.]

I ask my colleague what he thinks of Riddleberger and his readjustment and repudiation now?

Mr. TELLER. When was the ordinance adopted?

Mr. KELLOGG. In 1879. I stated in the outset that I thought a spectator in the galleries or on this floor would be astounded at the statements made by my colleague regarding the State debt of Louisiana. If they were not absolutely too ridiculous I would go a little more into his assertions in regard to the State debt; but there is one thing that he stated which has not escaped my attention, and I propose to devote a moment to that. It is that the colored people now, accepting the situation, just hanker after an opportunity to vote the democratic ticket in Louisiana. Well, I think this statement will astonish any man within the sound of my voice who knows the condition of affairs in Louisiana; I know it would the people, irrespective of color and race or party predilections, in Louisiana. In the district in which I live, and I live in Iberia Parish, where the races are about equal and the registered vote is about equal, we got in the neighborhood of 800 majority at the last election. I suppose the colored people all rushed to vote the democratic ticket, and it is the first fair election they have had the last eight or ten years. In Saint Mary's Parish we got a larger majority than we were really entitled to according to the relative proportion of the races. La Fayette Parish, a democratic parish, my colleague will tell you we carried, or very nearly carried.

So of Saint Martin, another democratic parish. So of La Fourche, and so of Terre Bonne. In Assumption, where the races are about equal, we had 300 majority for member of the Legislature in 1876 and some 600 or 700 majority this year. The other parishes averaged nearly this majority at the last election, where the races are just about equal. But there is where we had a fair election. They were grinding their sugar; it was in the month of November. Every man's time was worth a good deal, and the planter could not afford to have any disturbance among his hands. To use a common expression of the Louisiana planters, "they knocked off work on election day and gave the boys a holiday." All went to the polls and voted. We had consequently over six thousand majority in this district. Still we are told the colored people voted the democratic ticket!

But this result did not hold good in every part of the State. In the cotton region it was not so important for the planters to keep the peace, and what was the result? I ask my colleague how many votes did the republican ticket get in the parish of Ouachita?

Mr. JONAS. As many as it was entitled to.

Mr. KELLOGG. It got just one; and in 1872 when I ran against Mr. McEnery, in this parish of Ouachita where he lived and where his brother lived who is now the lieutenant-governor of the State, and where the registration was entirely taken by democratic officials, and where we had not a single representative at one poll in the parish, I obtained nearly 900 majority over McEnery; and there are three colored to one white vote in this parish now.

Mr. JONAS. At the election in Ouachita, my colleague is quoting such figures as the memoranda and scraps received by politicians told him was the vote in Ouachita Parish. The parish of Ouachita gave McEnery a majority, elected a democratic senator, and elected two democratic representatives in 1876, and it has given a democratic majority ever since.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was speaking of 1872, and not of 1876.

Mr. JONAS. I thought you were speaking of 1876.

Mr. KELLOGG. No, sir. In that parish in 1872 we got nearly a thousand majority, and in 1874 we elected members of the Legislature without dispute; and, when we came to 1876, I read an extract from a report of a lieutenant of the Thirteenth Infantry a little while ago, and by such bloody deeds as there described the vote of our people was suppressed.

Right here in passing I want to say, in regard to what my colleague said when he was last on his feet, that the testimony referring to that which I had read at the Clerk's desk was part of the evidence given by slanderers of Louisiana, suborned witnesses, and so forth. I will tell him that if he will go to the files of the War Department he will find as matter of record the report of the colonel of the regiment, the captain and the lieutenant of the company referred to, company C, I think, of the Thirteenth Infantry, which reports were through the colonel sent to the Adjutant-General, and by him to the War Department. He will find that I rely exclusively and entirely upon what was set forth in the reports made by those subalterns through their chiefs to the War Department in regard to the transactions in Ouachita and other parishes.

In the parish of Ouachita in 1874 we elected indisputably two members by 600 or 800 majority; but in 1876, by such frauds as I have described, the vote was changed, and in 1878, when Taylor Beattie, a native of the State and an independent republican or an independent democrat, was running for governor, and Gillespie, one of the largest planters, as my colleague knows, in the parish of Concordia in the old times, an old-time whig, was running for lieutenant-governor, they got some 76 votes only, so great was the terrorism; and at the last election, as I have said, one vote only. Still the colored people make haste to vote the democratic ticket. They voted it unanimously in Ouachita, but down where I live, in the sugar district, where the races are equal and the registered vote is equal, with none or few representatives of the republican party at the polls, we got 700 or 800 majority in several of the sugar parishes.

Mr. President, it is humbug; it is bald, unblushing, unjustifiable effrontery to say that the colored people of Louisiana vote willingly the democratic ticket. What, sir, the people in whose cabins you will find the picture of Abraham Lincoln as their emancipator and of Ulysses S. Grant as their defender, men who in times of political excitement hide those pictures under the floor-boards of their cabins—tell me that those men who have learned from their childhood to regard the democratic party as their natural enemy, who have been hunted in the swamps, who during election times know well if they attempt to assert their right of citizenship conferred on them because of their loyalty to the nation that it will be the signal for an onslaught on them and will cost them if not their lives, at least their liberty and safety! Tell me that a class of men who know nothing of the democratic party except that they know them as their oppressors will go to the polls willingly and vote for the candidates of that party! Oh, no, sir! Human credulity is taxed too much to assume that. Let the colored people of Louisiana vote and 98 per cent. at least will vote for republican candidates. They will go to the polls and vote the republican ticket. Turn to your files and you will find the testimony of one Captain Sinnott, which is illustrative, a noted steamboat captain in New Orleans; my colleague knows him very well. He testifies that at a time of considerable political excitement he hired a warehouse in New Orleans and put therein some two hundred colored stevedores and paid them wages several days before the election, and put tickets in their hands and led them to the polls on the morning of the election, and he testified before a congressional committee that, to his utter astonishment, each and every man took from the other pocket a republican ticket and voted it. [Laughter.] Oh, no, sir, let the colored people not only of that State, but of all other States in the South, vote upon the question of President and Congressmen—they may vary a little in the matter of a constable or a police juror—and they will vote always for the republican.

Now I want the attention of my colleague a moment longer.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask my honorable friend if he will allow me to call his attention to a resolution passed by a democratic convention in Tensas, in 1878, which I think illustrates more fully than a long speech will the alacrity with which these men vote the democratic ticket. The testimony showed that in this parish the colored republicans appointed a committee to confer with the democratic committee to see if they could not put up a joint ticket, and that is in a parish that the governor says in his message has ten colored people to one white man; and at their meeting the democrats declined to accept the joint ticket, and passed this resolution:

> A committee was then appointed to wait on the leading colored men and say to them that any effort on their part to get up a ticket in opposition to the one just nominated by them would be regarded as a declaration of war.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am reminded just now that my colleague intimated that I did not reside in Louisiana. I suppose he meant to imply that I was a carpet-bagger, that I belonged to that peculiar class denominated "carpet-baggers." Well, sir, I was not born in Louisiana. I do not know that I am any better for that or any worse. By an accident of birth my lot was cast very much further north; but I may say that my immediate predecessor at the time I took my seat here in July, 1868, was born in France and his colleague was born in the West India Islands. Mr. Slidell was born in New York. I think I may say that there have been but few, perhaps not more than five or six, Senators, natives of Louisiana, here in the last forty years. My colleague himself is a carpet-bagger. He was born in the North, I believe. I remember his father very well as the postmaster of Quincy, Illinois, appointed by President Lincoln. [Laughter.] I do not think there is very much to be said on that score; but it is proper for me to say here that I have large interests in Louisiana, and have had for the last fifteen years. That I have large agricultural interests there is well known.

Mr. President, I think it is useless for me to go on longer in this discussion, but I will take this occasion to say that probably at an early day, if occasion offers, I may have an opportunity and will avail myself of it to go into the question of the manner in which elections have been conducted in Louisiana. I desire, however, before I leave the subject, the attention of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and I want the attention of Senators on this side and on the other side, to a simple statement that I desire now to make.

Much has been said about the returning boards in Louisiana; a good deal has been said here for years and in the other House and in the public prints and throughout the country regarding the manner in which elections have been conducted in Louisiana by partisan returning boards and the power lodged in the governor. Now, I believe I am correct in stating—and my colleague will correct me if I am not—that immediately after the Nicholls government took charge of the State government of Louisiana, finding a law on the statute-book authorizing the police jurors in the respective parishes to designate the polls and name the commissioners of elections, and finding in a large number, some twenty-odd parishes out of the fifty-seven that constitute the State, a majority, and in some parishes all the police jurors (five in each parish) were elected as republicans, they passed a law among their first acts providing that from and after the passage of the act the governor should be authorized to appoint, in his discretion, not to exceed five police jurors in every parish in the State, so as to give by his appointment a majority or all of the police jurors of the State to his party. At the election of 1878—and that law only ran till the next General Assembly—they elected, under the general election law passed by the Nicholls Legislature contemporaneously with this police-jurors act, police jurors in every parish. Those police jurors were to hold till the next general election; but at the last session of the Legislature in 1880 they provided by the passage of another act that all these offices should be vacant, that the governor should appoint every one of the police jurors in all the parishes of the State, who should in their turn hold their offices until the next general election in 1883; and the election law provides that the police jurors of every parish shall divide the parishes respectively into election precincts and designate the polls in each election precinct, and designate the commissioners of election, whose return is final; and the registration law provides that the assessor appointed by the governor shall register all voters, and that he shall furnish to the sheriff the registration of the parishes, and on the morning of the election the sheriff causes to be printed the names of the legal voters in the wards of the different parishes respectively and hands them to the police commissioners appointed by the police jury, and they hold the election, make the returns, and file one with the clerk of the court and place another in the hands of the returning officer, who returns them to the secretary of State, who makes a promulgation of just what they are, just the votes that A receives, and just the votes that B receives, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i."

Thus the governor of the State by a special law appoints in all the country parishes the police jurors, abrogating the election of those who were elected as I have stated. These police jurors designate the polls and designate the commissioners of election. And the governor also appoints the man who registers the vote. In the parish of Orleans the governor appoints the man who registers the vote, and the man who designates the commissioners of election, and at the last election he refused to give the republicans any representation and proceeded to register up to the very day of the election in contravention of the law which provides that ten days before the election the registry books shall be closed.

So in the parish of Orleans, where nearly a third of the vote of the State is cast, the governor appoints the man who registers, the man who designates the commissioners of election, and the persons who make returns of the result of the election to the secretary of State; appoints all the men that have anything to do with the election. We had a returning board in the full light of day sitting in the State-house, lawyers always representing the democratic party and the republican party, an open investigation seen and read of all men. The metropolitan journals always published the morning following the proceedings of the day preceding, and it was always known just what the vote that came from the parish was and the evidence on which the returns were changed, if changed at all; but under the present system of election laws in Louisiana there is a returning board at every poll in the State, made up exclusively of appointees of the democratic governor, and their returns are never open to revision.

It may be said, however, that under this system of holding elections it is not necessary to perpetrate so many acts of open violence as under the old laws; for here they can simply make the result to suit their own wishes. The colored and white republicans may here be allowed to vote, but after the polls are closed the election really begins.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am disappointed that we have not been able to reach a vote on this resolution this afternoon. I hope we shall all come here to-morrow impressed with the duty of reaching that vote. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FARLEY. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw it for the moment, holding the floor.

Mr. FARLEY. I was about to ask the Senate to go into executive session. If, however, the Senator from Massachusetts insists on his motion to adjourn, I shall waive my proposition. My purpose was to ask the Senate to go into executive session to attend to a few matters that are really of vital importance at this time. I am receiving every day from my State solicitations from democrats and republicans to urge action upon treaties which are now pending and demanding consideration. My colleague and myself are both in that position. I want to say further——

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I cannot yield for that purpose. If one-half of the dilatory motions that have been made to-day on the other side had been omitted, and we had proceeded to vote, we should have been through with this matter, and then could have taken up the important business in executive session. I make the motion to adjourn now in the hope that our friends who feel the necessity of attending to the business in executive session will take hold in earnest to-morrow morning, and dispose of this matter. I insist on my motion.

Mr. FARLEY. We have been trying to go into executive session every day, but the Senator from Massachusetts and Senators on that side oppose it.

Mr. DAWES and others. Order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR CARPENTER.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following resolution; which by unanimous consent was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the necessary funeral expenses and those of transporting the remains of the late Hon. M. H. Carpenter to the State of Wisconsin, as set forth in resolutions of February 24, 1881, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee and audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday's session, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the motion indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT put the question, and declared that he was in doubt as to the result.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] for the day.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I observe that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is not in his seat. I am paired with him on this vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired this morning with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired this morning with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Grover,	Lamar,	Voorhees.
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,
Camden,	Harris,	Maxey,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Burnside,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Teller.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt of Conn.,
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Anthony,	Garland,	Mahone,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gorman,	Miller,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Plumb,	Walker,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Ransom,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

So the motion was not agreed to.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senate has refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business upon very many occasions for the last seven days, and generally by a tie vote. That being the business for which this session of the Senate was convened, as the Senate has again this morning by a tie vote refused to proceed to the consideration of that business for which we were convened, and as I have little hope from the indications of the morning of our being able to proceed to the consideration of that business, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on the first Monday in December next, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that motion will not prevail. I feel that we ought to go to the business before the Senate and not adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on the first Monday of December next, on which he has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the Senator in the matter.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I will state once for all that I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] until he appears in his seat to-day. I suppose if here he would vote for this motion. I should vote against it.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay." I make this statement for the day.

Mr. CAMDEN, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say now, so that I need not announce it any more to-day, that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] upon all questions.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] The Senator from Colorado would vote "nay" if he were here, and the Senator from Arkansas, I suppose, would vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Beck,	Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Brown,	Fair,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Butler,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Camden,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,

NAYS—28.

Blair,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Frye,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller,	Sewell,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Teller.

ABSENT—25.

Allison,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Van Wyck.
Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Vest,
Bayard,	George,	Plumb,	Walker,
Conkling,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	Saulsbury,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Pending that motion I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 26, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada.	Vance,
Farley,	Kellogg,	Van Wyck.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. As the Senate is a little thin and the motion of the Senator from Missouri is to lay the resolution on the table, I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour in order to give Senators time to fill the vacant seats on the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Is that motion debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the Senator would allow me to say that I am greatly surprised that his anxiety to proceed to the legitimate business of the Senate has oozed out so entirely this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to take a recess for one hour. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Colorado, was called.) The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] upon all these dilatory motions, and I make the announcement of the pair for to-day. The Senator from Colorado would vote "nay" on this motion if he were present.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was completed.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to announce now, that it may apply to the rest of the votes for to-day, that my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Beck,	Coke,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Brown,	Fair,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Butler,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Camden,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

NAYS—28.

Blair,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Conkling,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Teller.

ABSENT—24.

Allison,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

Davis of W. Va.,	Groome,	Plumb,	Vest,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Ransom,	Walker,
Farley,	Jones of Florida.	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion for a recess was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that the pending resolution be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired to-day with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As I stated a little while ago, I am paired on these questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Butler,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Voorhees.

Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Vance,

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, if the brave words of the President of the United States in his inaugural address are to be carried out in effective practice during his administration we shall have, I think, in the end no more such scenes as these. The President, in his inaugural, said:

> The civil service can never be placed on a satisfactory basis until it is regulated by law. For the good of the service itself, for the protection of those who are intrusted with the appointing power against the waste of time and obstruction to the public business caused by the inordinate pressure for place, and for the protection of incumbents against intrigue and wrong, I shall, at the proper time, ask Congress to fix the tenure of the minor offices of the several Executive Departments, and prescribe the grounds upon which removals shall be made during the terms for which incumbents have been appointed.

As all who have the pleasure of an acquaintance with the President of the United States know, he is a student of history. He must have known what was the result of the introduction of such a civil service in another country from which we have derived many of our institutions. He has studied closely, I not only do not doubt but I happen to know from the speeches that he has made in the other House of Congress, the results of civil-service reform in England, and no doubt he hoped for even greater and better results here. The historian of that civil-service reform says:

> After the explanations already made, it is hardly necessary to say that members of Parliament have practically ceased to possess patronage. They must, in their election contests, make their appeal for support on the principles of their party and their own worth as men. Offices, places, or promotions in the public service can no more be bartered for votes or peddled for influence. Parliamentary patronage—that prolific and degrading element, for a hundred and fifty years one of the great curses of British politics—is substantially no more, and no one mourns its loss or denies its corruption.
> The same influences which have raised Executive appointments above the corruption of parliamentary traffic have in the same spirit made themselves felt within the doors of the two Houses. We might easily go back to the time when the appointment of the subordinate officers and clerks of Parliament was attended with personal contests as desperate, with management as lamentable, with a subordination of worth and experience to partisan interests and ambition as much to be deplored, as any which have ever been witnessed in our legislative bodies. Only a faint remnant of such abuses has survived the later reforms in Great Britain. As a rule these clerks and officers of Parliament go on from session to session in the orderly and satisfactory discharge of their functions, which are in no proper sense political. They are required to pass an examination before the civil service commission, which is sufficiently stringent to secure an order of capacity quite beyond what a mere partisan struggle is competent to supply, to say nothing of the saving of time, temper, and dignity.
> In the House of Lords, an officer (the clerk of Parliaments) with a tenure which in practice continues during good behavior selects the persons to be examined for clerkships, and in the House of Commons the selection is made by the librarian, who holds his place by the same tenure. These clerkships, I am assured by high authority, are looked upon by members as without political significance, and the discharge of their duties is not regarded as affected by partisan considerations. The dignity of legislative functions is no longer degraded either by petty wrangles about readers, engrossers, and messengers, or by general contests in the interest of local patronage, rival factions, or ambitious leaders.

In order that the Senate of the United States may not longer present the spectacle so graphically described by the historian, I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I wish to respond, feebly as I know I shall be obliged to do, to the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Ohio. He and I labored together upon a committee at the last session of Congress to bring about a long desired result of improvement in the civil service. I desire, if the public have not been attracted to the services of the Senator from Ohio, so valuable and persistent as they have been, to call public attention to the fact that the Senator has labored "in season and out of season." I hardly recollect a day of the last session on which the Senator did not call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he had bills pending to correct all this evil. I know the Senator pressed those bills. The Senator will give me credit for sincerity in saying I have never known bills pressed so constantly upon the attention of the Senate as the bills which the Senator did himself so much credit as to report to the Senate.

I agree with him and with the President of the United States that the tenure of office must be regulated by law. I do not see how in this executive session we can enact such a law. I am exceedingly anxious, as I have tired the Senate with repeating, that we shall get over this difficulty and proceed to the executive business.

The Senator has read with great force the sound sentiment expressed about the long continuance in office of the officers of the British Parliament. We struggled two years ago to convince the Senator and his associates of the force of that truth. We showed that the officers of this body had been long in service; and the Senators on the other side admitted that they had been faithful in service. We appealed to them then to adopt the sentiments which the Senator has produced to-day; but we appealed in vain. The majority of the Senate chose what we thought was an unwise departure from that sound doctrine which the Senator has presented to-day.

I assure the Senator that just as soon as we can recover from that unwise departure on the part of the then majority in the Senate we shall adhere, with all the persistency that a majority is authorized by the Constitution to adhere, to the very sound doctrines that the Senator has promulgated to-day and keep in office, with the judgment of the country behind us, those faithful public servants who have been long tried and found efficient and faithful. That, I think, is the purpose of the constitutional majority of the Senate to-day. I regret that my friend from Ohio, with whom I am laboring and whom I am following, with unequal step I know, in an effort to reform the civil service of the country, indulges in dilatory motions to prevent our recovering from that unwise departure which threw out of office two years ago able, efficient officers of the Senate, so as to let the Senate come back as quick as possible to the position from which it was thrust unwisely and improperly two years ago and in violation of the doctrine here read. This is my purpose, sir. I do not care who is Secretary of the Senate or who is Sergeant-at-Arms of this honorable body; I care to have the civil service of the country put upon a permanent foundation, so that when we have able and efficient officers in office we shall not turn them out as we did two years ago.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts makes the point that the removal of officers of the Senate by the democratic party two years ago was unwise, and his purpose is to do away with that unwise act and restore them. Is that the point?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. Then I would ask the Senator, was Sergeant-at-Arms French a capable and faithful officer?

Mr. DAWES. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. I only want an answer to that question. If he was a capable and faithful officer and you wish to do away with this unwise act of his removal, why do you not restore him as you restore the old Secretary?

Mr. DAWES. I will answer that question when we come to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We are at it now.

Mr. DAWES. That is not the pending resolution. The pending resolution is that we proceed to the election of these officers, and whenever the resolution comes up to which the Senator makes allusion, if the Senator will move an amendment to that resolution he and I will discuss it.

Mr. MAXEY. That is not the point, Mr. President. The Senator has made his own resolution and he says that he wants to do away with this unwise act.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. And in support of that he proposes an entirely new man for Sergeant-at-Arms and keeps out the very man that he says it was unwise to turn out a year ago.

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose any such thing. I propose to proceed to the election of officers of the Senate. The Senator from Texas is a little confused this morning. He does not know what the pending question is. When the question of a Sergeant-at-Arms comes up I shall be happy not only to listen to the Senator, but if the Senator shows me where a better man can be found for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms than the one I propose, he will find me tractable, and he will find me disposed to co-operate with him the moment he satisfies me of that point; but I have a constitutional infirmity of submitting to the will of the majority; I was so brought up and I cannot depart from it easily in my old days. I am anxious that the will of the majority shall prevail in this body, as it has in the country. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his courtesy.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question for information?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts and I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am much obliged to the Senator from Ohio. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question for information. I see what purports to be a letter reading thus:

COMMITTEE-ROOMS, READJUSTER ORGANIZATION,
Richmond, Virginia, October 28, 1880.

Let me assure you, as I do confidently, that our electoral ticket, headed by Cameron and Riddleberger and pledged to Hancock, will carry the State by a plurality of 25,000; that it will beat either the funder or grip-sack tickets by this vote—not less. Rely on this.

WILLIAM MAHONE.

What is the "grip-sack ticket?" That is what I want to know. I want to know what is the grip-sack party.

Mr. DAWES. I answer the Senator in a way in which I have been brought up to answer questions sometimes, and that is this: Is it any objection to Mr. Riddleberger in the mind of the Senator that he supported Hancock?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. None in the world.

Mr. DAWES. Then why is he troubled about it so?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not troubled about it.

Mr. DAWES. It does not trouble me.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am asking for information. I ask which is the grip-sack party.

Mr. DAWES. Well, I do not know. [Laughter.] They have down South all sorts of parties running there; I do not know who they are or what they represent. The Senator ought to know. I am astonished that he gets up here and says he is after information about political parties down South, and he asks a man who resides in New England to tell him something about them. The Senator from Georgia ought to know every phase of every political party that has ever come up, for certainly if there is anybody who has tried them all it must be the Senator from Georgia. [Laughter.] I do not know of any party, so far as my limited observation is concerned, that the Senator has not at some time in his public life given in his adhesion to. I remember a letter that the Senator wrote a few days after Garfield was elected, advising everybody to join the Garfield party [laughter] and invoking the public to come up now and join the party that had succeeded. That seems to be the first emotion in the mind of the Senator from Georgia in all his political sailing about this country in the ship of State, [laughter,] to find out which party has succeeded and then to announce his desire to go with that party. I think he said that nobody could tell how much he loved Garfield in that letter, passing the love of woman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the speech of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very much. It is one of the most instructive speeches I have listened to in a long time; one of the most hopeful, but still with all the Senator's erudition and wit he did not answer my question. He pleads ignorance, and yet he has——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not know when he is answered. That is the trouble.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Precisely. The Senator said he did not know himself what the "grip-sack" party was.

Mr. DAWES. I told the truth.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Precisely. The Senator is ignorant of an important matter, and yet he is affiliating with and is following as his leader the controller of the Senate, the man who is the author of the phrase "grip-sack party," and now he tells me he does not understand the language of his leader. Can the Senator be so ignorant as that?

Then the Senator is also kind enough to say that I wrote a letter soon after the election inviting everybody to support General Garfield. The Senator is slightly mistaken. I am sorry that my friend from Massachusetts is both an ignorant man and a mistaken man at the same time. I do not think he is either. I think with artful skill he only assumes to be both.

But, Mr. President, we are all on this side appealing to the republicans to come forward and help sustain the present Administration. The President has called us together, informing us that extraordinary reasons required the assembling of this Senate in executive session to confirm nominations, and we are moving and have moved over and over again to go into executive session to confirm the nominations of the President, the republican President. All the democrats have responded to the appeal to confirm these nominations. The gentlemen on the other side refuse to confirm the nominations. They let the Supreme Court remain vacant, they let the Court of Claims remain vacant, the circuit courts of the country remain vacant, the administration of justice standing still, foreign missions unfilled, offices unexecuted, only that they may put in office here a supporter of General Hancock and the author of the "grip-sack" party term.

I am pleased always to enlighten one I esteem so highly as my friend from Massachusetts. I like the Senator from Massachusetts very much; I always did. He is a true man in every way; he dodges a little sometimes, and that is all the trouble I have with him. Get him in a close place and he can come out slicker and better than any man I ever saw. [Laughter.] No doubt about that. Still I esteem him—

With all his faults I love him still.

I asked the Senator the meaning of the term "grip-sack party" used in a letter written, I believe, in October last by the Senator's distinguished leader at present. I see an explanation, a partial explanation of that term from the same party in Virginia. It seems from a document which has been sent to all the Senators I suppose, and I hope it has reached the Senator from Massachusetts by all means, that there seems to have been a meeting in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, only the other day, March 28, in which certain resolutions were passed indorsing the course of the Senator from Virginia, the republican Senator from Virginia, and the fourth resolution relates to this subject of the grip-sack party. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to that resolution; it will enlighten him. The Senator does not often need enlightenment, but this will enlighten him somewhat. I hope he will take the cue and follow it up until he becomes a very learned man on the subject of party nomenclature. That resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That we, the readjusters, treat with merited contempt the calumnious charge of being repudiators brought against us by the Bourbon democrats and grip-sack republicans, and claim that we are the more honest debt-payers of Virginia, &c.

It speaks of the "grip-sack republicans." Is the Senator from Massachusetts enlightened? Does he now know which the grip-sack party is? Does the Senator belong to the grip-sack party? Is he a grip-sack republican? And yet these gentlemen who are indorsing your candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms, who want you to elect the candidate for Sergeant-at-Arms, say they treat with contempt the charges of the grip-sack republicans. Who are the grip-sack republicans? They are not democrats, that is very sure; but what does this term "grip-sack" mean? I think with this cue my friend from Massachusetts can explain the whole matter.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, a single word. The Senator from Georgia says that he loves me still. I can assure him that the republican party like him best when he is not still. [Laughter.] The day after the election last fall there was great inquiry in the democratic party what was the cause of their defeat. I remember out in the Northwest an ardent and ambitious and astonished democrat came out in a newspaper and inquired what was the cause of their defeat; and he was answered because the Senator from Georgia had not been born dumb. [Laughter.] I assure him that it is a gratification to us that he was not born dumb. He has been useful to us, and we like him. I reciprocate his regard; and while he prefers that I should be still, I prefer, in a campaign at least, that he should be anything but still.

He is troubled very much about my ignorance of some of the party appellations down South. It does not trouble me any. His personal regard, his tender regard is all that leads me to regret the fact that I am so indifferent to those little petty phases of party politics that disturb the current of things in the southern country. We are moved on this side, sir, by political forces in which we believe and which the country understands and does not need any explanation of from myself or any attack upon by the Senator from Georgia in order to vindicate them before the public.

I assure the Senator from Georgia that they have not begun with this extra session, and they will not terminate with it. They are forces that underlie the Government itself and will conduct it through all vicissitudes and all storms, or it will fall unless the untrammeled and unterrified and undismayed voice of every voter in this land can tell upon the policy and the law which he is called upon to obey; the Government of this country will be a failure; and it is therefore in a conflict of life and death in this nation that we on this side are engaged, and we are determined to give over this contest when and only when every man in this land entitled to a voice in the laws he is bound to obey and in the election of the officers that are to execute those laws shall have the same effect and force whether he lives in the humble hamlet in the marshes of Louisiana or on the plantations of Mississippi, or whether he lives in luxury and in competence in New York or in any other State.

The genius of this Government is that it is no respecter of persons, that the ballot dropped into the ballot-box in Louisiana shall tell as much in the grand result as the ballot placed in that box in New York or in Oregon. All the electors of this nation have a common interest and a common destiny, and with that destiny it is that we on this side are enlisted, and whoever will come to our banner and stand by our side in this great warfare will be welcome, whether in the times past he has been erring enough to fight against the flag of his country or as yet has not got the scales entirely from his eyes. Even though he may seem partially blinded as yet, the time is to come when his vision shall be clearer by the very contest in which he has engaged, and he will grow stronger and stronger in the fight every hour that it continues. Sir, men grow strong in the conviction of right the longer they are contending against the wrong, and that is my hope. When I hold out my hand for recruits in this great army of ours, I do not stop to inquire where men have in the past been wandering or whatever may have been their errors; all I want to know now is whether to-day and in this hour he is fighting for that great right of American citizenship dear to every man and underlying all other rights in this country.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I really, when I asked a good-humored question of my friend from Massachusetts, did not intend to excite him. The Senator has made three attempts to reply to a simple question, and has not replied or alluded to the question itself. He has finally concluded to make a speech of a very dignified and grave character; a speech in which there was not a word that I now remember that I do not fully concur with; but the speech of the Senator has impressed me that I ought to say something now on the subject to which he has brought our attention; not that I intend to be betrayed into a speech or into a discussion to-day. Nothing was further from my intention or thought. I have been waiting patiently for the speech delivered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] on Monday to appear in the RECORD. I may have misunderstood the remarks of that Senator, and I am exceedingly anxious not to misrepresent him. If I did not misunderstand his speech, he incorporated in it some of the grossest misrepresentations in relation to the Southern States that have ever been uttered in this body. I hope I misunderstood him. I hope, if he did utter such statements, he will carefully revise his speech and correct them; for I have no desire that he should publish a mistake. I had intended to say nothing on that subject until that speech should appear, so that I should be certain that I did not misrepresent the Senator; for I will say that I at least always desire to represent correctly the views of others, and I think that I can claim the credit of never misrepresenting an adversary in debate. I never make a position for an adversary and then answer it. If I cannot answer the position that my adversary himself takes, I will not answer him at all. I think the most unfair, the most improper—I had almost said the most dishonorable—style of debate in the world is to misrepresent your adversary and attribute to him a position he does not occupy and then claim great credit for shrewdness in answering it. Always state fairly and frankly what your adversary says. For that reason, and to do that, I have been waiting patiently for the printed speech, read apparently from printed slips by the Senator from Virginia; for I hope when I come to read that speech in the RECORD I shall find that I have misunderstood it.

But there is one point to which I will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, the attention of the Senate, and the attention of the country, and I shall do it in no equivocal language. I have noticed in nearly all the republican papers for the last two weeks, and I have noticed in divers speeches delivered on that side of the House the attempt to justify this coalition with the Senator from Virginia and his party of what he calls readjusters in that State by the republicans of this Senate by a charge that they lead off in favor of equal rights, of a free ballot and a fair count in the Southern States. No man, I believe, as far as I have observed, has had the face to say that the southern people are opposed to a free ballot and a fair count. They seek to imply that; they seek to have that implied. Whether intended or implied, I stand here to say that it is gratuitous, false, and untrue, and I stand here to say that the charge that the democratic party in the South desire by force, by fraud, by intimidation, or by any means to prevent, to obstruct the full and free enforcement of the new amendments to the Constitution and the equal rights of all citizens without regard to race or color, is utterly untrue.

Now, sir, I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment. Read the language of the speech of the Senator from Virginia; read the language read by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, taken from the New York Times, in favor of what he was pleased to call a free ballot and a fair count; and I ask is it any better than the language I am now going to read; is it any plainer; is it any more dignified; is it any more explicit; is it any more manly? Now, sir, I will read an extract from a speech delivered on a memorable occasion in the capital of my own State by one of the most distinguished men of that State, and I ask the attention of the Senate and the country to it. He said——

Mr. TELLER. Who is it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will tell you in a moment:

The slavery system, while in existence, was incompatible with this view. But we must remember that we are not now living under that system. As already stated, we live in a new era, and the new South must adopt new ideas, must wake up to new energy, and must stand upon the broad platform of equal rights and equal justice to all. We must conform to the Constitution and laws as they now exist; and we must see that every citizen, whatever may be his race, color, or previous condition, has every legal right to which he is entitled. Legal equality must be strictly and impartially enforced; social equality must be left to take care of itself in the South, as it is left in every other land. I am for a free ballot and a fair count, and for the execution of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments in honest good faith.

It has been charged that I have probably promised some colored men, in case of General Garfield's election, to try to secure positions for them. I do not know what influence I may have with the new Administration. It will be my purpose to deal justly and liberally with it. While I sacrifice no principle of democracy, I shall make no unnecessary assault upon the Administration. I prefer, as far as principle will admit, to act in harmony with it, and if I find that democrats cannot get the patronage in our State, as the colored race constitutes a large majority of the republican party of the State, I believe they would be entitled to be represented in the distribution of the offices. Some of them are now qualified to fill certain positions, and if the party with which they act is in power, they would seem to be entitled to something. Senator HILL, in 1870, said that he would prefer an honest negro to a dishonest white man. Doubtless there are some white men in Georgia no more qualified for position and no more honest than some of the better class of the colored race. We had just as well make up our minds to meet the issue fairly.

The reconstruction measures must be executed in good faith, and the legal rights of every citizen must be respected and protected without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Now mark these words:

I do not wish while I am a candidate to mislead the representatives of the people, and I therefore state my position on this question distinctly and frankly in advance of the election which is to take place to-morrow. I understand this to be exactly the doctrine contained in the democratic platform and in the letter of acceptance of General Hancock. We have made these pledges to the country and should carry them out in strict good faith.

That speech, sir, was delivered in the capital of my State on the night of November 15 preceding the senatorial election on the next day by my colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] and he said to the democratic Legislature there assembled, "I deliver you this speech to-night that you may not be deceived as to my position." What was the result? The next day the election came off and he was elected by a two-thirds vote by an overwhelmingly democratic Legislature. Why? In distinct affirmance of the principles I have read, boldly, bravely, courageously announced.

Now, I wish to know why is it, in the face of these facts, that gentlemen will constantly assume that somebody in the South must move off in favor of a free ballot and a fair count? Is the position of the Senator from Virginia any more distinct on that subject than the position of my colleague, a position which he has always held? Is it any more distinct than the position of the democratic party of the State of Georgia, which on the very next day affirmed their approval of these sentiments by his election by a two-thirds vote? If the Senator from Massachusetts simply wants to co-operate with those in the South who are in favor of a free ballot and a fair count, I ask the gentleman to cut loose from the returning boards in that section and come into the democratic party.

Mr. President, why should it be otherwise? As my colleague said yesterday in a spirit of manly frankness that ought to command the respect of this whole country, the opinions which he formerly entertained on the subject of slavery and secession he does not entertain now. Neither do I; neither do my people; neither do the people of the South, and we have affirmed it in every form. We do not approve the method by which the results of the war were accomplished. That is true; but the results being accomplished we rejoice in them; and whether we did or not, we realize the fact that the results have been accomplished; they are incorporated in the fundamental law of our land, and it is the imperative duty of every good citizen of this country to adhere to them with the strictest good faith and carry them out. And yet the Senate was informed the other day that tissue ballots were fashionable in Georgia. I never before in all my life heard of a tissue ballot in Georgia. The most brazen carpet-bag plunderer in the State never has made that charge against the State of Georgia.

Why, sir, we are interested in having peace; we are interested there in giving these people their rights. Have not the people of Georgia, the good people of Georgia, the men who own the property in Georgia, the men whose interest is in the preservation of its society—have not they interest in dealing justly with all citizens? What do gentlemen mean on that side of the House when they constantly get up here and either affirm or imply that the southern people are opposed to executing these amendments and are opposed to giving the colored people their rights?

I repeat, sir, that the charge is not only unmanly, but grossly untrue. Why, sir, I could stand here and read by the hour extracts not only from the speeches of my colleague, but from all the leading democrats of Georgia affirming the same thing.

Mr. President, let there be no mistake. I have as much confidence in the masses of the northern people of the republican party as I have in the masses of the southern people of the democratic party. I maintain that the masses of the people in this country, North and South, are honest. They are equally interested in good government. The masses of the people do not desire to do injustice to any portion of this country or to any race or color in this country.

This movement to get up a party by a coalition between the republicans and the readjusters, as they are called, of Virginia, if it be based upon the idea that the democracy of the South are unwilling to do justice to the negro, is based upon a false idea. It is based upon a pretext which is nothing but a pretext. The people of the South are just as honest as the people of the North, and the people of the North are just as honest as the people of the South, and I have no respect for a man of either section, or of any party, that gets up here and hypocritically claims for the people of his section superiority over all others.

Who are the men in the South that own property, that are educated, that are interested in peace and good society? Are they not the men who compose chiefly the democratic party? Why should they be in favor of fraud and violence and forcible deprivation of the rights of any portion of the people of the country? Sir, these are slanders that have come from their enemies. They have been sown broadcast over the North. They have come from men who do not want the colored people to have their rights. They have been from the beginning the greatest enemies of the colored people; and if the history of the South for the last ten years proves anything beyond all question, it proves that wherever the democrats have come in possession of the State government, just in proportion to the length of time these governments have been in possession of the democracy, in the same proportion have the colored people increased in prosperity and education. I challenge any gentleman to take the statistics of the Southern States; at one time they were all under the domination of the republicans there, what were called the carpet-bag governments. They held possession of some of those States one year, of some two years, of some three years, of some five years, of some ten years. Now, Senators, take those States, see which got rid of those governments and see which have had their governments placed in possession of the democratic party of that country, and I tell you it is a fact which no man can controvert, it is an invariable fact that in those States whose governments have longest been in the possession of the democratic party the colored people have become most prosperous, freest, most peaceable, and best educated.

Sir, what the colored people of the South need is not your coalescing movement of the character indicated by the Senator's speech. What you want is an abolition of these race distinctions on account of color in your party. You cannot inflict upon the colored people of that country a greater wrong than to organize a movement based distinctively upon the idea of taking care of or doing something for the colored race independent of the white race. You must keep down these color distinctions. That is what we desire to do.

I make these remarks for the reflecting portion of this audience. I am not here to make ad captandum statements. The great fact I state is true, and ten thousand slanders cannot make it untrue. The interest of the colored people is identified in the South with the interest of the white people, and I know personally as a fact that wherever the southern State governments have been in the hands of the democratic party for years the colored people are voting the democratic ticket by thousands, because they learn from actual experience that they are better cared for, they receive better government, they receive more education and more privileges of every kind and character under that kind of government than under the other.

Now, I will not deny that perhaps in localities there are troubles, and have been troubles, as there have been everywhere. I can take up the records of Massachusetts and show testimony after testimony that the workingmen there do not get their rights and a free ballot and a fair count; but I am not going to do so, for I would scorn myself to charge those things upon the good people of Massachusetts. I will be guilty of no such thing. We have heard over and over again about other northern States; I have had document after document sent to me from the North giving evidence of what appeared to be the most outrageous injustice to democratic voters in those States. I have never produced it here; I have never produced it to arraign the northern people.

I maintain that the better class of people everywhere in this country are the men who are most interested in good government and most interested in giving every race and every color their full and equal rights, and no man on this floor has taken higher, bolder, truer ground on that subject than my colleague. If you want a pioneer on that subject, he is the man. Many others have done the same thing. The democratic party of my State have solemnly resolved it, and they have carried it out in their legislation.

Sir, I admit that after the war the Southern States were confronted with a great struggle. The colored population was suddenly set free. What was to be their own conduct nobody could tell. Thousands of men North and thousands of men South thought that our society would be utterly destroyed. Set free in their ignorant condition, their condition invited the interference of bad men, who sought to use and control them for their individual political purposes. We had a great struggle with those men to preserve our society, to preserve everything that was valuable to black and white. We are getting through that struggle. Does this movement mean that the struggle to place the southern State governments under the domination of a coalition of the colored people with the worst class of white people, looking to and designing political preferment, is to be revived? Is that ordeal to be repeated? If so, I have confidence that if the northern people can be made to understand it they will repudiate it. But I affirm here again, Mr. President, that if the gentlemen on the other side are sincere and desire truly to see equal justice and equal rights, a free ballot and a fair count, secured to all parties, to all races, and to all colors in this country, they will manifest that sincerity not by such coalitions as they have formed here in the last two weeks, but by a course directly opposite to that which they have pursued.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I feel constrained, Mr. President, to make a contribution to this debate. The contribution which I propose to make is a letter dated "Washington, District of Columbia," on the 6th day of November, 1880. It is addressed to "My Dear Mr. Chittenden," and signed "B. H. HILL." The letter was published in nearly all the leading papers of the country on the day of its date or soon thereafter. I find it in the New York Tribune of November 10, 1880. I send it to the Secretary's desk and ask the Secretary to read the letter.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is a good letter. Let it be read. It is an excellent letter.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is for that reason I desire it read. If it was not a good letter I would not desire it read here to-day. There is one part of it that I am particularly in favor of, that part in which the writer of the letter advises the democratic party to dissolve. [Laughter.]

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 6, 1880.

MY DEAR MR. CHITTENDEN: I regret so much to see you were defeated. It was a disagreeable surprise to me. * * * Well, my friend, the most anxious event in our history has become a fact—a solid North against a solid South! No language can express to you the view I take of this event for evil. It can have no logic—if continued—but disruption into several monarchies or the absolute consolidation of all the States into one empire. In either event our constitutional system will fail.

In my opinion the time has come when the one great question for real statesmen to consider is how speedily to break up this sectional solidity and organize parties altogether on other issues. The democratic party is hated at the North, and, therefore, it ought to be disbanded. The republican party is hated at the South.

and, therefore, it ought to be disbanded. Whether this hatred is just or not makes no difference. I would be glad to see a great national Union party organized, for I believe that the Government formed by the Constitution is a nation. True, it is a limited nation; but within the powers delegated to it by the Constitution it is as much a nation as any on the globe. But there are certainly some marked federal features in the Government, and these features were incorporated to enable the States to protect themselves from encroachments on their reserved powers. The Senate is the great federal feature of our system, and was expressly so organized to represent and protect the States as equals.

I really like Garfield. I do sincerely hope he will have a successful administration. He has the ability for the crisis. He must feel keenly the fact that he is elected solely by northern votes. But he has a great opportunity, and he can—if he will—easily and consistently destroy all sectional animosities and solidities, and be chosen for a second term by a majority of States North and South. This opportunity is far greater than the office itself, and if utilized will give him a fame which the office could not give and which no previous President attained. But will he do it? I greatly hope he will; and I greatly fear he will not.

I see a movement to make an issue on the result in New York, with a view to defeat Garfield in the count by Congress. There would be great danger of this but for one fact, and that one fact is, the South will not countenance it. The poor, divided, and abused South, if necessary, will once more save the country from a revolution, and, as before, will get no credit for it. The republican party will take the Presidency peaceably because the South wills it, and at the next election the leaders of that party will tell the people from every stump and pulpit in the North that the South must not be trusted. Nevertheless, we shall avert all revolution, not to win republican praise or to avoid republican abuse—for either is impossible—but solely because it is right, and we are determined to preserve the peace of the country. How long human nature can bear this, I do not know. It is injustice unparalleled, and wrong that ought to cover the North with blushes.

But I did not sit down to write you such a long letter. I only intended to express the deep regret I feel that you were defeated in the late election.

Garfield has no idea how I feel toward him, and how anxiously I wish for his success, and I suppose if he did know, he, like Mr. Hayes, would be afraid it would injure him with his party.

With warmest regards, I am, your friend,

B. H. HILL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I desire to ask my friend from Georgia—I know he is my friend——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Whether or not he still is of the opinion that the democratic party ought to disband?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that my friend from Wisconsin has asked that question sincerely, and I shall answer it, although I think it would have been fairer if the Senator had broadened his question and asked me if I was in favor now as I was when the letter was written of disbanding both the old parties.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I really would not feel disposed to take the advice of the Senator from Georgia in regard to the republican party; but he being a prominent member of the democratic party at present, I should feel like paying a good deal of attention to his advice in regard to that party.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is precisely the trouble with my friend from Wisconsin and with a great many like him: they can see nothing but their one party; that is all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We are compelled to see the other party very frequently.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Precisely, you see but one thing you desire to preserve, and that is your one party; and you will make any combination, any coalition—I had almost said, but I will not, any bargain—to give success to your party, and stop there.

Now, Mr. President, as the Senator has had that letter read, I will take occasion to say, that there is nothing in the world new in it as far as my opinions are concerned. If the Senator will take the trouble to read a speech which I had the honor of making in this Hall in November, 1877, he will find precisely the same sentiments expressed in that letter were expressed in this Hall, and I must say in perhaps better language than they are expressed in the letter.

I am disposed to treat this question fairly. I will say to gentlemen in all kindness that I am of the opinion that the best thing which could happen for this country, looking to its future, its peace, and its prosperity, would be the organization of parties wholly disconnected with the differences of the past.

Mr. HOAR. Why does the honorable Senator from Georgia attack the Senator from Virginia when he takes a step to that end?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have not attacked the Senator from Virginia. I have not attacked the Senator from Virginia for any such reason either. The question of the Senator from Massachusetts contains two gratuitous implications, short as it is. I have not attacked the Senator from Virginia at any time; I do not propose to attack the Senator from Virginia. If the Senator from Virginia has not been attacked by the Senator from Massachusetts in a most cruel and unjust manner, as he will live to see, I think, before he is much older, I am greatly disappointed, greatly deceived.

Sir, there is one fact this country ought to realize, and that is that beginning with the very foundation of our Government, beginning in the very convention that framed the Constitution, there were two parties as to what was the true meaning of that Constitution. Each party was as honest as the other; none was a hypocrite except the man who denied honesty to either. The worst enemy to this country the worst traitor to this country, the only real rebel in this country, is the man, whether he come from the North or the South, who imputes to the people of either section of this country a desire in their hearts to destroy the Government under the Constitution of the country.

The differences that culminated in the late war arose simply upon honest differences of opinion as to what was the true meaning of the Constitution. I have affirmed that often; I affirm it now. The war was fought upon an honest difference of political opinion; and he in the future will not be regarded as either a statesman or a patriot who undertakes because of the results of the war to affix crime upon either section.

The North had a right to maintain her view of the constitutional character of this Government; the South had a right to maintain her view of the constitutional character of this Government. It is unfortunate that they could not agree to settle their differences peaceably. As they did not agree to settle their differences peaceably, they went to war. It was as honest a war as ever was fought. The great actors in it, the men who fought it, the real war men in time of war and not the peace belligerents, were honest. Each side was struggling to maintain what it honestly believed to be its rights under the Constitution; each maintained its opinions with the lives of its supporters.

I do not envy the narrow soul of the man who would think or charge or seek to make any believe that eight million people who were willing to sacrifice their lives, and the lives of their children, and their property, and their all, in the maintenance of their rights were traitors and criminals. This country must rise to the higher plane of conceding the honesty of the great actors on both sides in the late war. I would scorn myself if I could stand here and abuse the northern people because of their view. I have never done it; as long as I respect myself I never will do it. No man is entitled to respect on either side who will abuse the other side as criminals. It was an unfortunate war; it was an unfortunate difference; it was a revolution. When the South could not maintain her position by reason of her physical infirmity she yielded, and she yielded as bravely as she fought. Her honor is pledged to maintain the settlement that resulted, and the people of the South will maintain it. They admit that the result of the war was to change the character of the Government. Whereas before 1860 we lived under a Government of consent, the corner-stone of which was the consent of the people, we believe as the result of the war of 1861 that we live under a Government the corner-stone of which is force. But we accept it; we accept it in good faith, and one thing that reconciles us to the result is the abolition of slavery.

Upon the subject of slavery let me say another thing. I have now some respect for those abolitionists of the North who honestly believed that slavery was wrong and ought to be abolished, and many of whom refused to take oaths to support a constitution that recognized slavery. They were manly and honest. But the truth is that when the war began neither side intended the abolition of slavery. The North did not intend it any more than the South; the republican party did not intend it any more than the democratic party. Mr. Lincoln in high and manly phrase disclaimed such a purpose in his inaugural address; the republican Congress disclaimed it in every form; but, sir, there was a Providence which shaped our ends in spite of the follies of all parties to the contest. That Providence so ordered the war that slavery was abolished as the result; and let it be recorded that there is no portion of this country better satisfied with that result than the southern people.

Mr. HOAR. I am much interested in the Senator's statement, and I should like to ask him, if it is agreeable to him to be interrupted, whether the statement which he makes of gratification at the adoption of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery he also makes in regard to the adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which also have been for the advantage of the colored people?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have said emphatically, and I suppose no man wants me to repeat it, unless it be the Senator from Massachusetts, that we accept all the results of the war, including the three amendments. We do not approve of the manner of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment; we do not approve of the manner of the war.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misunderstands my question. If he will allow me, so that he may understand it, I will make a brief statement. The Senator, I understood to say, not speaking of the particular manner of the adoption but of the substance, that the abolition of slavery in this country was a great good to the country. He does not attribute it to any party, but he says that it was a blessing conferred upon the country by Providence itself, as I understand him, and whatever may have been differences of opinion in the past, a great benefit has accrued to this country by the setting free from bondage of four or five millions of its people. I did not understand him to be discussing the method of the passage of the thirteenth amendment, but the great substantial achievement. Now, what I wish to ask the Senator is whether he also, making no question of the propriety or impropriety of the manner, considers that the conferring upon those four or five million people of the right to vote and of equal citizenship before the law as expounded in the two other great amendments was also a great good to this people and to them, or whether he now considers it an evil?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer the Senator's question with a great deal of pleasure and with entire frankness. My opinion is that it would have been better for the people of this country, North and South, and for the colored race, and for the purity of our elections, if some plan could have been amicably devised by the concerted action of the two sections to improve the intellectual condition of the negro before he was introduced entirely to the suffrage. That is my honest opinion.

Mr. HOAR. That is as to the question of manner.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer your question if you will give me an opportunity. If I had been consulted, if I could have had my way, I would have said that whoever is admitted to freedom in this country under our form of Government is necessarily admitted to citizenship, and whoever is admitted to citizenship ought to be admitted to the exercise of the trusts and franchises of citizenship; but the manner of the admission ought to be guarded so that an improper or an indiscreet manner of that admission should not work injury to the country. I am of the opinion now that then it would have been wiser, it would have been better, if the people North and South, throwing aside their passions, had met together and said, "Here are four million freed people; perhaps nearly one million of them are males of voting age; must they have freedom and not citizenship? Must they have citizenship and not suffrage?" We would have all said, "No; they ought to have these things; but suffrage being a trust which every man exercises not only for himself but for every other citizen, the ballot-box ought to be guarded from a too great influx of ignorance into it; and while, therefore, we will protect the colored man in all his rights and mean to give him full citizenship and full suffrage, we propose to do it in such a manner as will do the least harm to himself and the most good to the whole country."

But a different policy was pursued. We were not here. The leaders, North and South, did not lay aside their passions. The North determined to give citizenship and suffrage immediately and unconditionally to the colored race. I say I think a different course would have been wiser; but the other course having been adopted we would not consent to change it. Whatever may have been the evils of the sudden introduction of such a large proportion of uneducated people to the ballot, the evils would be greater to attempt now to interfere with it. That is the view we take South.

We say, therefore, without stopping to criticise the wisdom of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, they were adopted; they were adopted by the constitutional authorities of the country that then had possession of the country; they form part of the fundamental law; and it is our duty not to weaken them by carping about their unwisdom, but it is our duty to strengthen them by giving them free and honest enforcement in good faith. We stand there.

It has been suggested to me a dozen times, but I do not care to go into that argument, to inquire why when the dominant majority here were making up the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and conferring universal enfranchisement upon the unlettered negro, they did not remember the rule in Massachusetts, and why they did not remember the rule in Rhode Island, that imposes the very restriction of which I speak. By the law of Georgia a colored man can now vote who if he lived in Massachusetts could not vote. Yet the suffrage having been conferred, it being the fundamental law, I repeat we accept it; we stand by it; and we intend to support it in good faith. What I complain of is the constant charges, either expressed or implied, from the other side of the Chamber, that the southern democracy are not satisfied to give the colored race their equal rights under all these amendments. The charge is untrue; it is unmanly and hypocritical whenever and wherever made, I care not who makes it.

As my friend and colleague [Mr. BROWN] suggests, if a hundred thousand of these people living in the South, for whom they express so much sympathy and whom they are so anxious to have vote, were to go to Massachusetts, your laws would not permit them to vote. But, sir, I am not the man to stand up here and throw charges at Massachusetts. Massachusetts has a right to fix her restrictions upon this subject; and I should be a hypocrite to be claiming superior honesty and superior intelligence for my people over Massachusetts; I will not do it. Others may play that petty little game if they wish; I scorn it. It is not only our conviction that the negro ought to have his rights under these amendments; it is our conviction that it is our interest to give him his rights.

Having said this much, let me add that the great trouble with the colored man in the South from the beginning has not been the democratic party, but the republican party, and I do not mean to be offensive when I say it. Gentlemen on that side may not realize it; but the great practical enemy of this country since these rights have been conferred upon the colored man has been the republican party. I do not charge it as your design. Why? President Garfield said in his inaugural that it was still a question in the South as to the right of the colored man to vote. There is no such question there. That is one mistake that the President made. There is no such question made by any democrat. There may be here and there an individual exception; I am not arguing from that; there is not one in ten thousand, not one in a hundred thousand. There are some wild men at the North and some wild men at the South; but he is unworthy of respect who undertakes to impute to a whole population the wild utterances of a few wild men.

The great trouble has been that the republican party have assumed that the real white men of the South would nullify these amendments. The first movement they made in the South was to organize a party upon the colored race and by disfranchising the white race under pretense that they were criminals because they had maintained their opinion, an honest political difference. The whole white people of the South were impressed with the idea that that movement of the republican party was not made in the interest of the colored men nor with a view of benefiting the colored men, but with a purpose of governing the white race through the colored race. You see how offensive that was. There is where you struck the first unfortunate blow. Whether you did it intentionally or not I shall not stop to say, but the effect of your measure was to create the impression in the South that your object was to govern the white race through the colored race for party purposes and to give you party power.

Having disfranchised 250,000 of the very best class of southern voters by your reconstruction acts, including in that 250,000 all those who were experienced in public affairs, as has been often said, men came there to take the offices that would otherwise have been filled by these citizens of the South, and they sought to get those offices by operating through the ignorant negroes and colored men. There was the danger. It was easy to make the colored men believe that their old masters were their enemies. The men who came there to get the offices through the colored men went to work to make the colored men believe that the object of their old masters was to re-enslave them. The real object of the men who took charge of the colored men for the purpose of using them was to get themselves into power, as has been often proven, to plunder both black and white. The southern whites, to preserve their society, to preserve their property, to save themselves from utter ruin, were compelled to unite, and did unite necessarily, against the movement which sought to control that country in the interest of a few bad men through the illiterate and unlettered colored men.

That has been the origin of the great trouble with the settlement since the war. The northern masses do not understand it. We have been battling in the South not for party, not for political power; the great struggle in the South has been for the preservation of our society. There were wise men in the North who saw this thing at an early day, but they were few. The cruel and wicked assassination of Mr. Lincoln, one of the most cruel and wicked acts ever recorded in history, and one of the most unfortunate for the southern people, so inflamed the passions of the northern people that they were not in a condition, as I think, to reason properly on this subject; but over all the passion of that stormy period there was here and there a truly great man of the republican party who rose up to the grandeur of the demands of the situation. One of them, I remember distinctly, was Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts. If the whole republican party after the war had been animated by the broad, manly, and patriotic statesmanship and views of Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, thousands upon thousands of the evils that have afflicted this whole country since the war would have been avoided. If the republican party had come to the South proclaiming their honest purpose to be, and showing their purpose to be honest by their acts, to protect the negro not against, but in co-operation with, the white people, the republican party would have had possession of every southern State. I have always believed it.

Mr. Morton early took views of the same character. Mr. Sumner before his death, I have the best reason to know, uttered some of the sublimest sentences upon this subject. Mr. Greeley uttered similar sentiments through the Tribune and otherwise; and it ought to be a lesson to every reflecting man of the North that because of Mr. Greeley's manly utterances upon this subject the South came to his support even for the Presidency. What would the southern people have done if the whole republican party had been manned and officered and governed by such statesmen as Governor Andrew, Horace Greeley, and Mr. Morton at that time, among others I could name?

No, gentlemen, unfortunately the republican party was taken possession of, I fear, by men who wanted to use that party for perpetuating its party power; and they thought the best and most effective way to perpetuate that party power was to govern the southern people by force, to keep alive the angry passions of the war, make a solid North against a solid South, and let the people vote as they shot, as was expressed by some of them.

Sir, the people of the South had lost much; they had given up the ideas to which they were born, in which they were reared, and they had given them up bravely and frankly. They had given up property and never asked compensation for it. They had seen their very society imperiled. Everything was confusion and anarchy. But even in that terrible condition they still had a sense of manhood and refused to kiss the hand that further smote them. What could they do? You complain that the South went into the democratic party. Where else could they go?

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] reminded the Senate the other day that I was before the war a whig. So I was, and I am proud of the recollection. I was raised up to worship at the shrine of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, and would to God we had such men to lead us to-day. Oh, that we had Clay and Webster here to look upon this contemptible little coalition to get the offices of the Senate. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] I was a whig. The Senator said that I was a Union man and went to the Georgia convention and voted for secession. It is false, gratuitously false. Senators are mistaken. They did not mean to utter a falsehood. The people who honored me know that I have never betrayed their trust. There has not been a day or hour from that time to this that they have not been willing to renew their confidence by conferring any office in their gift upon me.

But I wish to say one thing right here, and I wish to say it emphatically, that on the test vote, agreed to be the test vote, I did in point of fact not only vote against secession, but, as my colleague knows, made the very last speech that was made against it, and as earnestly as I ever spoke in my life. Nevertheless, I claim no credit for that here. I render no account to that side of the House or to the northern people for my course on secession. The gentlemen of the South who voted for secession were just as honest and just as patriotic as I was. I have just as much respect for them as I have for myself. It was an honest difference of opinion. They thought under the circumstances secession was right and the only remedy. I thought differently. They had as much right to their opinion as I had to mine, and I claim no credit for the difference. I only did what I thought was my duty, and they did fully as much.

Why am I now a democrat, an earnest democrat? Why have I been a democrat since 1867? Because I was a witness to the condition of things about which the gentlemen on the other side knew nothing. I saw the republican party come into my country when it was powerless and helpless, prostrate and poor, deprive our people of the right to the counsels of all their wisest and best men, and seek, as I believed then and believe now, for a mere party purpose, to put the white people of the South under the domination of the unlettered and ignorant negro for the benefit of a few thieving carpet-baggers. I rebelled against it, and I would have been unworthy to be a man if I had not rebelled against it. I would scorn myself if I could remember that I did not rebel against it.

But I had no purpose, as my colleague has said of himself, to oppose the reconstruction policy as a mere question of power or to resist it. I thought then you made a mistake, and I think now you made a mistake; but you drove everything in the South into the democratic party, not for party purpose, not for political power, for we knew that was gone, but the white people of the South were compelled to unite for the purpose of preserving their very society, and we succeeded. Under an amount of obloquy unequaled the southern people have achieved wonders. They struggled in some States shorter, in some States longer periods to get rid of this unfortunate state of things that you brought upon them, until they have all gotten possession of their State governments; and what do we see? A state of prosperity, stability, health, and peace, which has never been exceeded in the history of this country. In my opinion it will not be a decade before the southern people will be stronger and more prosperous in every sense than they ever were in any period of their history.

What have we to dread? Just what seems to be here now inaugurating. The evil that afflicted us in 1867, immediately after the war, we see now attempted to be repeated. What is it? A coalition of the republican party as a party with a dissatisfied minority element in the South who are seeking to combine the republicans and the negroes, not for the good of the colored man, but for the simple purpose of getting control and domination in that country. That is what we believe; and we know as evidence of this fact that all these gentlemen who come forward and profess to be so broad and so liberal, who, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, are giving us a new risen sun, and who think they are going to be broad and liberal and elevate the South, come into the republican party abusing their own people, every one of them.

Gentlemen of the republican party, I do not address your party passions; I do not address your sectional hates; I address your intelligence as men when I put to you the question, do you believe that you can ever control any country in antagonism to the intelligence, the property, and the virtue of that country? Do you believe that you are ever to elevate the parties and politics of the South by abusing the better class of people at the South? We have had troubles on the question of suffrage unquestionably. I am not going into them. If I should go into the details of those troubles and explain them fully to you, you would be shocked; but the very men who seek to head what they call a liberal movement into the republican party at the South are the men who have done more to dispute the right of the colored man to vote than any other portion of our people.

Now I say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] he will see the meaning of what I am after in that letter to Mr. Chittenden. The democratic party and the republican party were formed upon old issues that existed before the war. They were parties to those issues during the war. The democratic party generally was charged with favoring that theory of the Government which the South had entertained, the republican party with favoring the other theory; and upon those differences they fought. Those differences have been settled. There is not a democrat on this side of the House who will not be willing to take up General Garfield's inaugural and re-echo the words which he uttered when he declared that the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof are supreme alike over States and over individuals. It is a settled doctrine; it is a fundamental law. Within the Constitution the Federal Government is supreme; we all concede it. Under the Constitution the colored man has an equal right with the white man to vote; we all concede it; we are sworn to support it. We find that the colored man is doing well, better than we expected. It is our duty as well as our desire to help him do better. We shall succeed if we are not interrupted by this marplotting that always comes from without and takes the form of coalition between the republican party and discontented southern men in quest of office and power, who have not and never have the slightest use for the colored man except as they could use him in the game for power as the gambler uses his cards.

I say it would have been far better for the country if the wise men North and South when the questions upon which the war was fought were all settled had met together and said that the parties which were organized and formed upon settled issues ought to die with the issues. That is what I meant in the Chittenden letter. Who will dispute it?

But, on the contrary, the great purpose of the republican party has been to live on those war issues. The only nourishment of the republican party is the passions of the war. Mr. Sumner rose to the grandeur of a patriotic statesman when he said the very emblems of the war ought to be removed from public places. So, sir, the passions of the war ought to be removed from the hearts of the American people, and the issues of the war ought to be removed from the political parties of the country.

As the democratic party was originally formed upon those issues before the war, as the republican party was formed upon those issues, I say that when the issues themselves were settled it would have been the part of wise statesmanship on both sides of the line to have organized parties on living issues and not perpetuate them on dead issues. So I say now; so I have said ever since the war; and so I will always say that it would have been wise and patriotic. How can it be done? If a democrat comes out and suggests that for the very reasons I have given one party ought to disband, a gentleman like my friend from Wisconsin says, "Oh, yes; I agree to that proposition, but we will not disband." Every reason on earth for disbanding one party so far as representing issues is concerned exists for disbanding the other.

It ought to be a gratifying fact to the American people that no portion of the people of this country were ever at heart the enemies of the form and system of government under which we live. No portion of this country is more devoted to our constitutional system than the southern portion; but every movement, every expression, every utterance that comes from the southern portion of this country in favor of a broader field of politics, in favor of freedom from the passions of the war, in favor of a return to peace and the methods of peace and equal justice to all, is slapped in the face by the republican party, which seems to feel that it will die unless it can keep alive the issues and passions of the war.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman really believe that? Does he really now, in his own heart, mean that in the full sense of his words?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is the most astounding declaration I have ever heard.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There are a great many astounding things to the Senator from Connecticut. I do not believe the masses of the people of the North mean it; I do not charge it on them; it does not come from the masses of the republican party; but I say now, and I repeat, that every movement that comes from the South in favor of burying the issues of the war, in favor of forgetting the passions of the war, in favor of hiding from view the wrongs of the war, is met by a demand from the republican party that we must evidence our faith by joining the republican party; and you allow no man to be patriotic at the South unless he accompanies his professions of liberal political sentiments with a hegira over to the republican party.

If what I have said is true, if, as you are aware, the republican party was formed on issues settled by the war, and if those issues were formed on honest differences of opinion, both parties forming them on those issues ought to be disbanded. But it is impossible. When I wrote that letter to Mr. Chittenden I was writing to a friend a private communication. I was writing as I felt. I was not proposing the organization of new parties. There is nothing in that letter looking to a proposition to organize new parties. I was only expressing what would be best for the country if the men of both parties were wise and looked only to the good of the country and not to the mere success of party.

I say to my friend from Connecticut—I will not charge him with it, I will allow him to be just as patriotic as he desires to be, and just as wise as anybody can claim for him—but I say to my friend from Connecticut now that the very movement over which you seem to be rejoicing of a coalition between the republican party and the readjusters of Virginia, as they are called, is going to do more to set back the really liberal movement you profess to desire than anything that could occur. You cannot organize a party to control the South that insists upon misrepresenting everything in the South that ought to be respected. No man can take up the stale slanders of the carpet-bag régime about intimidation and bulldozing and tissue ballots and frauds and all that sort of calumny and charge it upon the better class of the people of the South and make headway in the organization of a party there. You cannot do it, and every wise man in this country ought to know it.

Gentlemen often talk about Bourbons. Every man who now wants to make favor with the republican party begins to talk about Bourbons. What is a Bourbon? I do not know, I confess. Gentlemen have not defined it. I do not know what they mean by a Bourbon. Do you mean by a Bourbon a man who is in favor of the Constitution as he understands it? Do you mean by a Bourbon a man who will not enter into a stealing coalition? Do you mean by a Bourbon a man who is in favor of honest government? If you do, I am a Bourbon. If you mean by a Bourbon a man who is in favor of recognizing no results from the war, who is still insisting that there has been no change in the Constitution, who is still insisting that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are void, then no man is a greater anti-Bourbon than myself. I was always an anti-Bourbon in that sense, all my life; I am yet; and I affirm that of the 130,000 democratic voters in the State of Georgia it would be impossible to find one hundred Bourbons of that type. I do not know of over half a dozen in the State myself, and all those half dozen are not co-operating with the democratic party with any earnestness or zeal.

Now, sir, I want to say one thing: You cannot alarm the South by words. I repeat the language of my colleague uttered to our own people, uttered on the night before they were to pass on his merits and election: We realize at the South that we live in a new era; we realize that there has been a war; we realize that that war has had results; we realize that those results have been incorporated in the fundamental law of the land; we realize that they are binding on our people; we realize that among those results is the utter destruction of the theory of secession, the utter abolition of slavery, the enfranchisement of the colored race, its admission to equal privileges, legal and political. We admit all that. If that means the abandonment of Bourbonism, the South, the democratic South abandons, and abandons cheerfully, Bourbonism. But understand, gentleman, while the South may thus abandon Bourbonism, she will not embrace political blacklegism. She is not going to be caught by bargains, by coalitions. She cannot be purchased by the public patronage. She cannot be wooed by slanders; she cannot be won by calumnies. Realize that the southern people have as much interest in good government as the northern people; that they have as much interest in doing justice to all sections of the country as have the northern people; that they have just as much interest in doing justice to all portions of their own population as have the northern people. We need no admonition from you on that subject. If you expect the South to come to you on her knees, you are mistaken. If you expect the southern people to come to you confessing that they are criminals, you are mistaken. A people worthy of association with any honorable people will not require such confessions, and a people worthy to be received into such association will not make any such confession.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for having spoken thus long. I know what I say will be taken up by the northern republican papers and misrepresented and perverted. It is impossible for a southern man to be correctly represented to the northern people; we have all discovered that through the republican press. We despair of having our views received even by many Senators on this floor with the same frank and liberal spirit that we announce them in. We have despaired of that. Ah, gentlemen, my candid opinion is that because of your perpetual uncharitableness, because of your perpetual determination to keep alive your party movement upon the assumption that the southern people are all criminals you have made affiliation between the better class of the southern people and the republican party an eternal impossibility. But I have said what I have said in the kindest spirit; I have accused nobody, and I never would accuse anybody. And now while I have been speaking the President has sent in an executive message; and that we may consider that message, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator concluded his remarks?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It seems so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. My colleague [Mr. INGALLS] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Morgan,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senate wish to hear an elaborate reply to the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] at this hour of the day. It is, however, quite likely that it is for the public interest that the debate which he has inaugurated should continue to the end. It is probably well that the relation of the southern democratic party to the State credit and to the credit of the country as indicated by its recent history; that the relation of that party to attacks on the national life; that the relation of that party to the amendments to the Constitution, and that its conduct in endeavoring to stifle or to destroy the exercise of the rights which those amendments assert and confer should be thoroughly stated. If we are, as we hope, entering on a new era, it may be well that these books should once for all be balanced. Evidence upon the files of the Senate, upon the files of the House of Representatives, the current facts of our history, cannot be brushed aside or destroyed by any assertions, however confident or however often reiterated. The Senator from Georgia does not seem to have discovered that a man's reputation either for wisdom or for virtue is not often constructed out of his own certificates; and we have heard the Senator's testimony to his own wisdom, to his own fairness, to his own consistency to a degree I think never equaled by any character in history, and never conceived of with one exception in any character represented in fiction. Possibly the excellent Mr. Pecksniff may come up somewhat to the character which the learned Senator has drawn of himself. But in substance the speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia is the most emphatic confession of the wisdom of the administration of the republican party in this country for the last fifteen years. Every one of the great measures which have separated the two parties during the period that he has gone over in his speech is alluded to by him, if alluded to at all, to confess how thoroughly and utterly he and those who acted with him were mistaken, and how absolutely we who opposed them have been right.

The Senator finds a little fault with the manner, with the time, with the occasion when the republican party, clothed with the authority of this nation, took the great steps which have led to the new era, whose advent he himself professes to welcome. The same bitterness of reproach, the same assumption of superior virtue, the same ferocity of attack on our motives, we have heard from democratic lips ever since we were born, when the present attitude of the republican party was being dealt with, only to be followed by a declaration, however, from the same lips, that they now see we were right, that they now have accepted what we have done as not only necessary, but as a great benefit to the country and to its people, and with a charge that we are making ungrounded attacks upon the character of good men when we impute to them any unwillingness to accept and to agree to as righteous and as just the things we have accomplished. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Georgia if he can mention a single one of the great issues that have divided these two parties in the past in regard to which he will affirm that he was in the right or in regard to which he will now affirm that we were in the wrong?

The honorable Senator began his political life when the great question of spreading human slavery into the Territories was before the people of this country, and when he and the party that he was associated with demanded as of right, as of constitutional right, liberty to indelibly dedicate forever those vast spaces extending from the Mississippi to the Pacific to the interest of that institution. Were you right or was your defeat one of the greatest blessings that Providence ever conferred upon this country? The invective and the savage ferocity of invective which we hear now from democratic lips was surpassed in those days, as gentlemen who represented democratic southern constituencies in the House before the war remember, probably not with much pleasure of recollection.

The next thing that divided us was the question of overthrowing the Government and establishing a new one at the South, whose corner-stone, in the language of a distinguished Georgian, was to be human slavery. Were you right, my honorable friend from Georgia, as you look back upon it now or was it fortunate, whether the best method was taken or not, that the method that succeeded did succeed?

When the war ended under the administration of Andrew Johnson the democratic whites of the South were suffered to take possession of the State governments of the Gulf States and some of the others. The honorable Senator from Georgia says that the republicans have been from the beginning the enemies of the colored race, and that he and his associates are their friends, and that it was bad and evil men who would undertake to persuade the colored people that these republican politicians were their friends. Was not every democratic vote in both Houses of Congress cast in opposition to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery in this country? Every one; and yet dares the Senator from Georgia now rise in his place and deny that that democracy to which he belongs was totally in the wrong, and that the prevailing of the republican party in this country was a blessing conferred upon it by a beneficent Providence?

What then happened? In those States these good white men, who so love the negro, proceeded to pass through their various State Legislatures laws intending to overthrow practically the effect of that amendment, and to reduce the colored people again to slavery. I have some of them here. They were all framed upon one type and upon one pattern. Those that I have here are the laws passed in the State of Louisiana, and similar laws were passed, I think, in the Senator's own State by the white democratic Legislature of that time. One enactment provided that if any person entered upon any plantation, without the permission of the owner, for the purpose of giving political or other information, except such as the master should approve, he should be punished by fine and imprisonment. Another made the habitual association of a negro with a white person a penitentiary offense; and still another provided that—

> Any justice of the peace, on complaint that any person is a vagrant, on summary process, may require such person to give bond for his good behavior and future industry for the period of one year. On failing to give such bond, the justice shall issue his warrant to the sheriff to hire out such person for the term of twelve months, under such regulations as may be made by the municipal authorities: Provided, That if the accused be a person who has abandoned his employer before his contract expired, the preference shall be given to such employer of hiring the accused.

Then the statute of 1865, chapter 16, enacted that—

> Any person who shall persuade or entice away, feed, harbor, or secrete any person who leaves his employer without permission, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment of not more than twelve months, or both.

Every colored laborer leaving his master without leave, by these friendly laws enacted by the white democracy of the South, was to be an outcast to whom food and shelter were to be denied by all mankind.

Then there is another statute which provides that a person who is without regular employment may be sold as a slave, punished by remanding into practical slavery the crime of being out of work.

Does the Senator from Georgia think that the party who enacted that system after the thirteenth amendment had made these men freemen are quite warranted in giving such lectures as we have listened to this morning, and in saying that it is only evil men who would persuade the negro that the authors of these laws were not his friends?

Then came the next step, the adoption of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which provides that all persons born or naturalized in the United States shall have all the privileges or immunities of citizens thereof; that no State shall make or enforce any law which should abridge them; and that Representatives should be apportioned according to numbers, except that when the right to vote was denied to any class of citizens they should not be counted in the representation. Then came the fifteenth amendment, inhibiting the deprivation by any State of the right to vote in consequence of race or color.

We are speaking now of the policy that determines the relation to this country of five million of its citizens; and does the honorable Senator from Georgia now rise in his place to say that the men who voted for those two amendments were wrong, and the men who resisted them by every instrumentality in their power were right? Does the Senator from Georgia say that the solid democratic vote, with one or two exceptions, from the South given against every measure for the resumption of specie payments or to secure the performance of the national faith to the public creditor, was right? The Senator rises when he says that his party stand upon the platform which he quoted from his colleague, to make a confession of error, of delusion, of wrong, in regard to all the great historic questions which have been before the American people since he has been in public life. When that Senator declares that the great republican policies of the last twenty years are accepted, that no man will desire to change or reverse a single act which had brought them to pass, he rises to make a confession of error, of delusion, of folly which at least ought to spare us such lectures as we have heard from his lips.

Now, Mr. President, does the Senator from Georgia propose to adhere to the statement he has made that the charges that the honest count of the votes and that the honest casting of the vote have been denied to republicans in a very large number of Southern States are unfounded? Does he adhere to his claim that that is a false charge stimulated by political malice? Does the Senator desire to have brought from the archives of this body and of the other House the terrible evidence? Does he know anything of the history of the State of Louisiana or Georgia or Mississippi? Was there ever a massacre at Caddo, or were there over two hundred members of a republican convention slain in cold blood in the streets of New Orleans? Was there ever a massacre at Coushatta? Were men ever murdered at Colfax? Are Twitchell's arms on his shoulders now? Are the Chisolm murderers convicted? Was Dixon shot in the back?

Mr. President, when the Senator rises to charge upon this side of the Chamber or the republican press of the North that this claim is a false one that they made, I should like to hear his opinion in regard to some of the evidence which has been reported to this or the other House of Congress by committees year in and year out year after year.

Mr. President, the Senator's colleague, he said, made a brave and a manly statement when he told the people of Georgia that thereafter there was to be a fair vote—a courageous statement! What courage did it require if these things never had been true? Does the Senator say that the Charleston News and Courier is a paper that fills its columns with slanders of the people of the South? Does he not know that that paper more than once after elections has urged upon the people of South Carolina that this practice of theirs must be changed? Would it require any great courage in the honorable Senator's colleague, if he were a citizen of Kansas or of Ohio, to stand up and declare on the eve of an election that it was his determination and the determination of those who agreed with him to insure to the republican and democratic voters of that State the right to go unmolested to the polls and not to be cheated out of their vote when they had cast it? The very application of the adjectives which the Senator used in regard to the speech from which he has quoted is a confession.

But, as I said, Mr. President, I did not rise to enter fully into this debate at this time. I would like to ask the honorable Senator if he has seen within a few weeks a circular or proclamation issued by the leaders of the white democratic party in the State of Virginia, issued I think since this special session assembled, in which they call upon their people to throw aside every other political issue and forget every other political difference until this contest for white government shall be settled and ended? I will see that the Senate has, before this debate is over, an opportunity to peruse the exact language of that circular.

Now, if the enemies of freedom and of the honest count and of the progress of this Republic, if the men who have planted themselves in resistance to every step which has been taken for the freedom and advancement of the colored race in this country may band together to keep their power, shall not those who differ with them unite to overthrow it? Will the honorable Senator from Georgia say that if a man entertaining and advocating the opinions which he has imputed to Mr. Riddleberger and which his associates have imputed to him were presented by a democratic caucus as a candidate in any southern State they would refuse to give him their support? The Senator, I know, will not say it.

As I said, I rose not to enter into a full reply to the rambling speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia at this time, but simply to give notice that there will be a full and thorough discussion of the issues which he has raised before this debate terminates.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I have heard from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] just exactly such a speech as I expected to hear, and I have too much respect for the Senate, too much respect for myself, and too much respect for ordinary good breeding, although I was raised in a slave country, to characterize that speech as I think it deserves to be characterized. I envy no man his future, his position, his prospects in this life or the next, who can deliberately get up in a council of the country like this and take pleasure in rehearsing charges against his fellow-citizens of either section of this country.

The Senator begins by rehearsing the issues before the war on the subject of slavery in the Territories. Is that manly? Is that fair? Is that patriotic? Do we not all confess that before the war we believed in slavery; that we believed that under the Constitution we had a right to carry slaves to the Territories? Have not those questions all been settled? Are we asking for any such right now? Is anybody claiming such a right now? Would it not be just as manly to make an issue with the framers of the Constitution itself? I think—and I say it deferentially—that one of the great errors made by the framers of the Constitution was in recognizing slavery as property at all. That is my honest judgment; but I should feel a sort of contempt for myself if I were to get up here now and impeach either the patriotism or the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution for having made that recognition in the Constitution.

The trouble with us all is that the people who have lived before and live now were not all as wise as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks he is, and they were not as good and perfect as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks he is. He is the general lecturer on the morals and the manners of other people, not having much of his own of either sort; and he rises in this body habitually and delivers lectures about the sins of other people.

I should have a contempt for myself if I could arraign the framers of the Constitution for committing what I think was an error in recognizing slavery at all. The issues that we had before the war grew out of the state of things then existing. There were as honest, there were as good men as the Senator from Massachusetts, who recognized the right of the southern people to carry slave property into the Territories. The great Webster himself on this floor in his memorable 7th of March speech, and in appeals for the Union such as the Senator will never be able to utter, recognized the compact with the Southern States on the annexation of Texas and the great constitutional obligation to enforce the return of fugitive slaves. If the Senator is to be justified and establish his right to be considered such a good man and such a great man by rehearsing the views of the southern people on the subject of slavery before the war, why could he not go back and rehearse the views of men in the North who passed personal liberty bills and who disregarded what Mr. Lincoln himself said in his inaugural address was an obligation of his oath, to restore fugitive slaves? The Senator would arraign Mr. Lincoln himself; and if I were to repeat here the language that Mr. Lincoln uttered in his inaugural the Senator would get up and read me a lecture, I have no doubt.

Sir, wise men realize that on those dead issues men differed, honestly differed, as I said, and he only is the hypocrite who claims a right to condemn men as criminals because they maintained their honest convictions as matters then stood. If the gentleman is justified in arraigning the South for our views on the subject of slavery, when those views were formed by our raising, by our education, by the place of our birth, I might retaliate by producing the blue laws of Connecticut, and the laws of Massachusetts for burning witches; I might rehearse the proceedings of the Hartford convention and all that sort of thing. I would not do it. I remember when I was a boy at school reading the history of the burning of witches in New England.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Georgia that no such thing ever happened in this world.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. As the burning of witches?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. The blue laws of Connecticut were a squib written by one Peters, which was passed off as history and from which the Senator from Georgia gets his information, I dare say; and no witch was ever burned in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Well, Mr. President, we will end that matter by saying that those things were in history and the history was written by northern men. I admit it is dangerous to accept what they say as true. [Laughter.] We did not write the history. Perhaps we were foolish for believing it. But, sir, though I may be the Pecksniff the Senator talks about, I am too much of a man to rise here and seek to create prejudice against any section of my country by taking up their acts in the days that are passed and gone when they thought they were right. I am not of that class of man, nor am I, thank God, his descendant, who stand in the synagogue and thank God "that I am not as other men are." We have all had our faults; our forefathers all made mistakes; I have made mistakes and I confess it, and the only man whose word is unworthy of credence here or elsewhere is he who would rise up and say he never makes mistakes.

I was born in a slave country; I was a slaveholder by the law and not by my will. I believed it was right; I was taught to believe it from my youth and from my infancy. Good men North and South believed it, and I will not characterize with the proper word the man who would undertake to criticise people for believing what they were taught to believe from their very youth. But while I do rejoice that slavery is abolished, while I think it is best for this country, while I believe firmly it is best for the white race South as well as the white race North, while I think the people of all this country ought to rejoice that slavery is abolished, I will say what history will prove to be true, that no class of laborers on this earth were ever as well cared for as the great body of slaves under the state of slavery in the South. I have seen incidents on the plantations as touching and as beautiful as the Senator ever learned in his own home in Massachusetts in reference to the relations between the master and the slave. But these things are gone. Why should they be rehearsed? And yet the Senator goes back to the period before the war and says that we confess our error. We do not confess that we were in error then. We honestly believed what we were then taught. We do rejoice that slavery is abolished, and we believe it is best for the whole country that it has been abolished, without reference to the means by which it was done.

Mr. PLUMB. What was the particular difference of opinion about the constitutional rights of the people of the United States that led to the war, according to the Senator?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not going into that. Everybody understands that the southern people held as they were taught by New England—the first time it was taught in this country it was taught by New England—that under the Constitution a State had the right to secede from the Union; that it was a part of our constitutional system; that it was not a war upon it, but was consistent with it. I am not going into that argument. I never believed the doctrine myself; but that was the doctrine taught by some of the wisest and best men in this country, and the South acted on it and accepted it as just.

But the Senator from Massachusetts went further. He wants to know if I approved certain acts read from the legislation of Louisiana, and says he thinks the same acts were passed in my State. That was not true.

Mr. HOAR. The same acts were passed, totidem verbis almost, in the same six or seven of the Southern States. If the Senator says they were not passed in his State, I will not affirm that they were, although my recollection is that they were. I once would have been able to state with great confidence and shall be able to do it to-morrow; but they were passed in substantially these words, some of them very much more offensive, however, in six or seven Southern States.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I shall meet the question, sir, as it ought to be met. I will teach the gentleman how to meet questions even though he charged me with lecturing. I dodge nothing.

In point of fact the State of Georgia passed the first civil-rights law on this continent after the war, even before the civil-rights bill of the United States Congress. But I claim no superior credit for Georgia for that, not a particle. Do not understand me as condemning those States that did pass laws which are now deemed objectionable. I admit this frankly and fully which every honest man in this audience and everywhere else will appreciate, that when the slave population were suddenly emancipated in their ignorant condition, in several of our States, and in all our States really, the most serious consequences to society were anticipated. It was an untried experiment. If you will look into the history of the country you will find that one of the great troubles of wise men North as well as South, before the war, was the danger of the sudden emancipation of the negro population, especially in those States where the negro population largely exceeded the white. The colored race were not to be condemned for being ignorant; it was part of their system of slavery, I admit; I dodge nothing. But when they were all suddenly emancipated, in some portions of the country where there were five colored people to one white person, our people did apprehend the most serious danger to their society. They did feel and fear that this population unaccustomed to the discipline of law, governed all their lives by force, would be unmanageable, would be dangerous; and it was not to injure the colored man, it was not from any malice toward the colored race, but for the protection of the white race and the protection of society from the dangers that we believed would result in too many cases from the large surplus of the colored people, that those stringent laws were passed. Now we would not pass them.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator whether they were mistaken, in his judgment, looking back at it now?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer the Senator very frankly if he will wait. I was going to answer that question. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying we were, and we were glad we were mistaken; we rejoice we were mistaken. I once thought in the House of Representatives when I heard the Senator make a speech that he would be one of the most fitting men on earth for a grand, broad, magnanimous decision as a member of the Electoral Commission, but I was mistaken. I have frequently heard that Senator when he was uttering sentiments which were beautiful and which I thought indicated that the Senator might be governed by principles of action which would be delightful; but I am sorry to say I have been mistaken. The Senator seems to take his chief pleasure in digging up the unfortunate differences that existed under a former régime and holding the present generation responsible for them.

Mr. HOAR. Will the honorable Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator certainly, I will not say misstates, but utterly misconceives the purport of my remarks. The Senator undertook to make some very severe charges upon this side of the Chamber, in which he charged them with having falsely claimed to be the true friends of the colored man and having falsely claimed that he and his associates were not the true friends of the colored man, and having falsely charged that he and his associates, or at any rate some of his associates among the white democrats of the South did not mean that the colored man should have his vote fairly cast and counted. To the first of those charges I replied by challenging the Senator to take a single one of the great issues which had divided us from him and his associates during the past twenty years, in regard to which he would not now admit that he was totally mistaken and that we were right. I made that challenge to him as a defense of the position which he had attributed to us, and with the view of asking him to consider, if he admitted himself that he had been wrong and we had been right twenty times, whether a little modesty in lecturing us about the twenty-first issue would not be becoming? That is the point.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I said in my remarks that the policy which the republican party had unfortunately pursued after the war had resulted in great damage to the southern people and to the negroes, and had made that party, as I explained, in my judgment—not in intention, I distinctly disclaimed that; I distinctly exonerated them from the intention of doing so—but stated that in point of fact the policy of the republican party after the war had been the most unfortunate thing that could possibly happen for the negroes, and made them the enemy of the negro in fact, not in intention. That is all. I admit that there was great reason for differences of opinion after the war.

But I go back to what I was saying. I say the Senator is arraigning us now and impeaching the faith of the democratic party now in accepting the amendments and in giving the colored people equal rights under the law, he is impeaching it by producing and reading in this Hall legislation that was passed immediately after the war, when all was anarchy, when all was confusion, when everything was new, and the southern people felt that their very society was in danger, and in places where the negro population was largely in the ascendant they believed it was necessary to adopt this stringent legislation for the protection of the white people and of society itself. That is all. But I say they were mistaken. So I say were the republicans of the North, and, gentlemen, some of you certainly will be liberal enough to meet me in a spirit of mutual frankness in this matter. I never expected it from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I think I have stated my opinion to the Senator very frankly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say you made mistakes on your side. The republican party made the gravest mistake. You made a mistake when you disfranchised the leading men of the South, you made a mistake when under your reconstruction policy, as I said before, you inaugurated a policy which made the southern people believe that your object was not to improve the negro but to govern the white people through the negro. I do not chide you for it; I do not say you are criminals for it. I think you made a great mistake, and I think events have proved it. If the Senator wants me to point out where the republican party has committed errors, I have just done it, and I have not confessed that I was wrong in those opinions. I say now that in my opinion, and it is formed deliberately, the unfortunate reconstruction policy of Congress after the war damaged the Southern States as much as actual war did. That is my opinion; but you did not intend it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state which of those three great measures he alludes to? I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but it may save the necessity of a reply by calling his attention. The Senator admits that at the end of that policy the South is in a position of uncommon prosperity. Now will he not admit that every one of those measures was right? He says our policy was wrong; but take every one of the three amendments, take the putting down of the rebellion, take the dedicating of the Territories to freedom, take every one of the great facts which happened, and will he name one of them as to which he can say we were wrong and he was right at the time?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The whole reconstruction policy was a terrible mistake; I have stated so over and over; a mistake for the colored man, a mistake for the white man, a mistake for the South, and a mistake for the North.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will permit me once more, I will endeavor not to interrupt him further. I understand the policy to be, first, the taking out of your own State governments when you passed those vagrant laws; second, the adoption of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery; third, the adoption of the fourteenth amendment; fourth, the adoption of the fifteenth amendment. That is what I understand the reconstruction policy to be. Does the Senator understand it to be something else?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do; and if the Senator will allow me I will proceed without his unnecessary interruptions. The reconstruction policy of which I speak is separate and distinct from the constitutional amendments. The constitutional amendments were one thing; the reconstruction acts of Congress and the policy inaugurated by those acts were wholly different things. The reconstruction acts, as I stated before, disfranchised, not only from the right to hold office but from the right to vote, 250,000 of the best men in the Southern States, the most educated and the most enlightened, those who had most experience in government, and that at a time when our people most needed them. I dare say, I believe at least, the authors of the reconstruction policy thought it was the only thing they could do; but my opinion now is that if that policy had not been adopted, and the republican party had based their movements in the South, if they chose to discriminate at all, by discriminating against what they called the secessionists—had based their movement upon the old Union sentiment and sought to reconstruct the South not by making the people believe the purpose was to govern the whites by the negroes but to co-operate with the whites in the improvement of both races—they would have avoided immense mistakes to both races. But you could not see it then; you were like ourselves. You can see it now, and all honest men can see it now. If you had it to go over, you would do differently. I have not the slightest doubt if the great men who then had charge of affairs and who adopted the policy of reconstruction had it to go over they would do differently; and I believe that if Mr. Lincoln had lived the country would have escaped the whole disgrace of this carpet-bag régime.

But the Senator says that I admit that we have all improved, that our States are all prosperous. So I do, but we are prospering not under reconstruction but in spite of it. No Southern State ever began to prosper until it got rid of your reconstruction government. That I affirm. Georgia, it is often said, is now more prosperous than any other Southern State. Why? Because Georgia was the first fortunately to get rid of those governments and get the possession of her State government in the hands of her own people. When did Louisiana begin to improve? When did South Carolina begin to improve? When did Alabama begin to improve? Not a single Southern State ever began to improve until we got rid of the people you fastened upon us by the bayonet.

I am not repeating these things to chide you, gentlemen; I do not impeach your honesty in doing them; I do not know what I should have done if I had been here in your place. I think that we shall all do better for all our people if we exercise a little more charity and talk about the improvement we have made in a proper spirit and not in a recriminating spirit.

The Senator from Massachusetts charges me with lecturing when he is lecturing himself in a much more objectionable manner. You made mistakes; we made mistakes; our fathers made mistakes; the framers of the Constitution made mistakes. He alone is an honest man who admits that he made mistakes, and he alone is a trustworthy man who frankly confesses his mistakes and corrects them, but do not understand me as saying, gentlemen, that the South owes any portion of her prosperity to the reconstruction policy. That would be a great mistake. We differed in my State on the subject of reconstruction. My colleague and myself widely differed on the question of reconstruction. Neither of us intended to resist the Government, but while he admitted that reconstruction was not what he would have proposed himself, yet he thought the best plan for the southern people was to accept it and get possession of their own as soon as possible. His principal object was not to revive prosperity under reconstruction, but to accept it as the shortest means of being in accord with the Federal Government, as he thought, and getting possession of our own. I thought differently. I thought the people of the North had waged the war for the preservation of the Union, and I thought the reconstruction policy was based upon the idea that the war was one of subjugation. Therefore I would not approve it or accept it. But when it became an accomplished fact, as it did at the end of two years, then I agreed to recognize the accomplished fact and accept it as a part of the law of the land and ceased to discuss its wisdom. In that my colleague and I united and agreed.

The State of Georgia was fortunately the first to get rid of the unfortunate state of things produced by your reconstruction policy. But I said in my speech, and I repeat it, and I commend it to intelligent Senators on that side of the House, take the statistics of the Southern States and it will be found that they have prospered in exact proportion to the length of time that they have been free from the governments forced upon us by the reconstruction policy.

Mr. LOGAN. I have listened very patiently here all day to these insinuations. Now I want to say this, and just this. The Senator from Georgia is very prolific in his suggestions about the mistakes of the republican party.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say to the Senator if I am making a misstatement of fact I will give way, but I do not want to yield for a speech now. I want to get through with what I have to say.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to make a speech, but I want to call the Senator's attention to one thing. We are told time and again by Senators on that side of the Chamber that the war is past and they do not want it alluded to. I was told so the other day. I have not alluded to it; but every time an opportunity is afforded the Senator or others on that side of the Chamber digs up every question growing out of the war. I want to say once for all that you, sir, and every other man who joined in rebellion against this Government is responsible for every wrong that you complain of.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I happen not to be as responsible as the honorable Senator when it comes to that. When he was standing in these Halls advocating a policy in the democratic party that encouraged the South to secede, I was there manfully breasting the storm. That is the difference between him and me. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will tell the Senator from Illinois what is a historical fact, that I was met on the stump in Georgia when I was opposing secession by arguments that he and such as he would stand by the South if they did secede.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not care to revive that, but you charged me with being responsible.

Mr. LOGAN. I mean to say this to the Senator, that any man who insinuates that I sympathized in the least with secession at that time insinuates that which is false. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no doubt of it. I did not charge it, but I said the Senator was quoted that way, and he was.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope there will be no cheering in the galleries. It is a violation of the rules of the Senate. If there is any more, I shall certainly insist on the rules of the Senate being enforced by having the galleries cleared.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Illinois will understand that I do not indorse what was said of him. I do not charge that he was guilty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL in the chair.) Will the Senator from Georgia allow the Chair to remind the galleries that neither demonstration of approval nor of disapproval by those in the galleries is permitted, and if repeated the Senator from Missouri gives notice that he will move to have the galleries cleared. The Chair will also take this occasion to say that when a Senator is interrupted by another on the floor, he must first obtain his permission.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I thank the Chair for that statement.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to say a word?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I give way to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I desire to suggest to the Chair, as I do not believe the innocent ought to be punished with the guilty, whether an assistant sergeant-at-arms ought not to be placed at a door of the galleries to remove those only who are guilty of disorder instead of clearing all out of the galleries. If either one or the other has to be done, I hope the Chair will order an assistant of the Sergeant-at-Arms to be stationed there to arrest the persons who are disorderly instead of clearing out those who are not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is instructed to remove all those in the galleries who make any further disturbance.

Mr. BECK. That is what I desire.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I want to say to the Senator from Illinois that when he rose in his place and charged that I and those with whom I was associated were responsible for all the wrong that the Southern States have suffered, I then reminded him of the attitude of himself and myself when this state of things was flagrant. I do not charge that the Senator intended to sympathize with secession—by no means. The Senator will understand me as making no charge against him; I am simply stating the historical fact.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire right here——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire once for all to settle this question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There is nothing to settle.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not intend to have insinuations of that kind cast at me when they are false. It has been done often enough. Sitting here in this Chamber is a Senator, one of your colleagues, a democrat, who knows that that insinuation is false; he has a right to know it; and if called on he would state in your presence that any man who insinuates that insinuates a falsehood; for he knew when we served in Congress together that I had no such sympathy. We talked the matter over and he knew exactly what I was going to do and what I proposed to do. I have never called on him; I do not do it now, for I am able to protect myself; but I say that these insinuations about my tendency in that direction have got to stop, for they are not true. That is what I say.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have said that I accept the gentleman's statement that they are not true.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, that is enough, then.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But if the Senator expects to stop me from reciting historical facts, he is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not expect to stop you.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I make no charge against the Senator; I have stated that; and his speech was as unnecessary as it was out of place. He must understand that what I undertake to say I say within parliamentary law, and I shall say it.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course; that is right.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The power does not exist that can prevent it, and I say so in all kindness. I have not the least ill-feeling for the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But he made a remark which did bring vividly to my recollection a state of things that I can never forget.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I said, and I repeat that when on our side of the Chamber we had been reminded often that the war was past and gone, that reference to it was not pleasant to certain gentlemen, at the very time these things were said to us, every day the Senator from Georgia and others not mentioned continually on all questions were digging up that which grew out of the war and was its natural and logical result, and making complaints against it. I said that those complaints were made against that which grew out of the war, and if they were to be made against the republican party the Senator and his colleagues were responsible for them, because they engaged in a war against the Government that produced these results; and I repeat it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. With all due deference to the Senator from Illinois, he must excuse me from yielding for any more such interruptions. If he will address his remarks to the Senator from Massachusetts they will have some proper application, for I am replying to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts in which he went back before the war and even dug up the issues about slavery in the Territories.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And he read to the Senate various acts of the Legislature of Louisiana passed immediately after the war ended. While I am replying to those things the Senator from Illinois stalks into the Chamber and in his lordly manner undertakes to lecture me about going back into old issues. It would be well if the Senator is to correct me that he should remain in the Chamber and hear everything that is said and keep up with the points of the argument.

Mr. LOGAN. I am in the Chamber as much as the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I agree that no allusion should ever be made to the past in a spirit of crimination, in a spirit of condemnation, and that has been my whole appeal to-day. I have made the allusion to show that we all have changed our opinions. It was not to revive any charges against that side or against the northern people. I stated distinctly that the North was as honest as the South in those days and the South as honest as the North. The great thing for the statesmanship of this country to realize is that both parties were honest in their opinions, and neither should be treated as criminals. That is the great mistake that has been made since the war.

When the Senator rises here to charge me with being responsible for the wrongs heaped upon the South it is remarkable. I am not alluding to him particularly. It is true I did hear the honorable Senator's name quoted, I heard the names of other great democrats quoted, before the war, on the stump in Georgia to prove to the people of that region that if they did secede they would have support at the North. It is a historical fact. I am not alluding to it to make a charge against the northern democracy, but it is so, and we did not get this support, and notwithstanding that fact, when the war came the northern democracy rallied valiantly in support of the Union. The Senator from Massachusetts will forget that fact, and simply charge them with their policy before the war, and try to make the whole of them responsible for it now. Let us forget all that. There were thousands of men living up here far more responsible for the war than thousands of men living in the South; but let that pass.

I go back to where I left off when the Senator from Illinois interrupted me, and I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that those laws from which he read were passed at a time when there were serious apprehensions all over the South that restrictions of that character upon the newly-emancipated race in their ignorant condition were absolutely necessary for the protection of society, and they were not passed in a spirit of enmity to the colored people. That is the main fact I want to bring out.

The Senator, not contented with that, revived the Chisolm massacre, and told us about various other atrocities committed in the South. I will make one remark on that subject. I say that when the whole southern white people unfortunately believed that, they may have been mistaken—mark now, I am not speaking in a spirit of crimination; I am speaking in a spirit which I think every man on that side ought to appreciate—I say that when the whole southern white people were made to believe that the republican party as a party in its reconstruction policy was seeking not to elevate the colored race, but simply to govern the white race through the colored race for party purposes, it did engender bitter strife.

Mr. HOAR. Who made them believe that except the leaders of the South?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Your carpet-baggers made them believe it; the men who came there under the protection of your bayonets and taught the colored people that their old masters were their enemies and would relegate them to slavery. They were the men who made them believe it. Of course their old masters did not make them believe it; we did not make them believe it; your emissaries made them believe it; the people who represented your party made them believe it; and it did beget an angry state of feeling; and it is out of the state of feeling engendered in that way that all the outrages that the gentleman alludes to were committed. In proof of it I say take my State. We had outrages in Georgia in the early stages of reconstruction; we had them as late as 1872. Of course the passions thus excited had to take some time to subside.

Mr. BECK. General Grant in 1865 said it was the effort of the carpet-baggers to engender the feeling.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. As my friend advises me, General Grant, who has said many good and true things, said himself it was the efforts of the emissaries that you sent there to create that feeling. You did not send them as emissaries but they became such; they were carpet-baggers who sought to use the negro and others too as a means of getting in power in those States for their own benefit, not for your benefit.

I want to say to the republican party, the greatest mistake you now make is in recognizing such people as worthy to be your leaders in that part of the country. They care nothing for republican principles or the republican party; all they want is to use your policy and take advantage of the vote of the negro for their own selfish ends. You ought to realize that such is their object when you are weighing and considering this question and passing judgment upon the conduct of the southern whites. Take and put yourselves in their place and say how you would act in that case. We have had outrages there; but the great point I want to make is, that in every State, in a reasonable time after the democracy came into possession of the State government, those outrages ceased and there has been perfect peace in that part of the country since. Take my State. There are no outrages there, and what you all say, what your papers say, that we compel them to peace, that we keep them intimidated, is utterly untrue.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator just this question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. For just one question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I prefer not to yield to the Senator; I have been interrupted so much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. BLAIR. Will he not permit me to ask him who convinced us, we being honest, that you meant to oppress the negro? The carpet-bagger convinced the negro; who convinced us and who convinced the Congress of the United States, if not the action of the southern whites?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Of course I do not know who convinced you, but I have believed that the stories of horrible outrages which the carpet-baggers and their allies got up at the South and scattered through the North for the purpose of keeping the North falsely impressed as to the South succeeded in creating that belief with you. It was a party necessity. They saw that the only way to maintain their power at the South was through the republican party, and the only way to retain the republican party in their support was to convince the republicans of the North that these measures were absolutely necessary, as these outrages existed, and thousands and millions of men at the North, as honest, as worthy, honest Christian people, I have no doubt, have honestly wept bitter tears of indignation over the heart-rending stories of outrages at the South that never occurred on earth.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator mean to say that is what convinced the Thirty-ninth Congress?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know what convinced the Thirty-ninth Congress. I am not responsible for the convictions of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. Does not the Senator know that the legislation of the South convinced the Thirty-ninth Congress?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator must excuse me; I do not know what convinced the Thirty-ninth Congress; I am not talking of that; but I say that whatever may have been the agency is not material. I am thoroughly satisfied that one great trouble between the North and South from the beginning has been the fact that they do not understand each other. I do know it to be true that you have had a lot of republicans in the South who have no interest in the republican party except as they could use it for their own selfish ends, and who had no interest in the negroes except as they could use them for their own selfish ends. They kept up in the North a systematic and a perpetual stream of calumnies and slanders upon the best people of the South for the purpose of exciting these prejudices. Do not understand me as denying that outrages did exist in many cases. I am not here to dodge anything. I admit that. In the state of society we had after the war it is marvelous that more outrages did not exist than did occur. I sometimes look back upon it, and I am not astonished that outrages occurred; I am only astonished that society itself was preserved. I think the best thing that can be said in defense of the southern people is that in spite of all the troubles and difficulties and obstacles that have been thrown in their way, it is a marvel that the southern people have been able to preserve their society and at so early a date re-enter upon the road of prosperity and peace.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Georgia will pardon me for one moment, I should like to read from a speech delivered by a gentleman upon the subject of the mistakes of the republican party. If I understand the Senator from Massachusetts aright, he says that they have made no mistakes. I should like very much to read from a speech, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me——

Mr. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like very much to read it for the especial benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Read it.

Mr. HOAR. If I have the floor I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina. I do not know who has the floor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have the floor; I am not through. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to read from a speech which I find was delivered May 5, 1876, at what was known as the Belknap impeachment trial, and was delivered by Mr. HOAR, one of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives at that impeachment trial. The language is in these words——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator had better let the Clerk read it; we could hear it better.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I prefer to read it myself for the especial benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think I can read it so that the Senator from Massachusetts can hear me:

> My own public life has been a very brief and insignificant one, extending little beyond the duration of a single term of senatorial office; but in that brief period I have seen five judges of a high court of the United States driven from office by threats of impeachment for corruption or maladministration.

The Senator from Massachusetts knows what five judges those were; I shall not name them.

> I have heard the taunt, from friendliest lips, that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption. I have seen in the State in the Union foremost in power and wealth four judges of her courts impeached for corruption, and the political administration of her chief city become a disgrace and a by-word throughout the world. I have seen the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, now a distinguished member of this court, rise in his place and demand the expulsion of four of his associates for making sale of their official privilege of selecting the youths to be educated at our great military school. When the greatest railroad of the world, binding together the continent and uniting the two great seas which wash our shores, was finished, I have seen our national triumph and exultation turned to bitterness and shame by the unanimous reports of three committees of Congress—two of the House and one here—that every step of that mighty enterprise had been taken in fraud. I have heard in highest places the shameless doctrine avowed by men grown old in public office that the true way by which power should be gained in the Republic is to bribe the people with the offices created for their service, and the true end for which it should be used when gained is the promotion of selfish ambition and the gratification of personal revenge. I have heard that suspicion haunts the footsteps of the trusted companions of the President.

I commend that language to the Senator from Massachusetts when he is talking about the immaculate purity of the republican party in this country.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not making a speech (although I may appear to be sometimes too earnest) with a view of exciting any feeling on this floor of an inimical or unfriendly character. I stand here to confess that we on our side in the South have made mistakes. I stand here to say that you on your side have made mistakes. I stand here to say that the poor South has been the chief sufferer of the mistakes on both sides. I seek to point out those mistakes, not for the purpose of reviving ill-feeling, but simply for the purpose of showing you what I meant when I said in the letter to Mr. Chittenden, to which the Senator from Wisconsin called attention, that it would have been better for the country if both parties formed upon these old issues that were settled and buried, I trust, forever, should have been disbanded and new parties organized upon living principles, upon our new state of things. We do live in a new era; we do have a new Constitution; we do have a country free from side to side and from end to end; we do have an anticipation of prosperity to the country never before dreamed of.

What I commenced complaining of was what I believe to be the initiatory movement on the other side of the Chamber to inaugurate a coalition for political purposes in the South to be carried out by renewing stale calumnies and abuse of the better class of the people in that region, and I protest against it. That is the only way I got into this debate. I agree to the grand language of the President in his inaugural that the questions involved in the war ought to be considered as no longer open for debate. We should remember them only to avoid their mistakes. I affirm here that whatever may have been the mistakes of the past, whatever may have been our teachings in slavery, whatever may have been our apprehensions in the early days of reconstruction, whatever may have been your mistakes in the policy of reconstruction, they are all over; they are all past. We are now upon the point of reviving prosperity and I trust of national reconciliation; and I ask, in the language of the President, that these things be buried. I would have been glad that both parties should have been disbanded and new parties formed, simply because I believe as long as these old parties keep in existence, who live upon dead issues and the passions that those dead issues excite, these evils will continue, but still while these parties continue I cannot afford to affiliate with a party that loses no opportunity, as I know, to malign my people. No, sir.

I had rather be a dog and bay the moon than a southern man and consort with the maligners of my people. I do not care what you think; I do not care how you talk about the outrages at the South; I know the better class of people are not responsible for them. I know the democrats of that part of the country are as patriotic as you are, as true to the Union as you are, just as much in favor of giving the colored people their equal rights and just as much in favor of a free ballot and a fair count as you are; but we cannot, for the sake of our society, stand by and see these coalitions formed for the purpose of using the colored race, in their ignorant condition, for party purposes, for personal ends, at the peril of the peace of that portion of the country.

Mr. President, I know that I have said too much; I know that I have spoken too earnestly. That is very likely; it is my habit; but I have said what I have said with the very best motives. I said in concluding my remarks before that I did not expect them to be appreciated by certain men on that side; I did not expect them to be appreciated by the press; and now having concluded, I move——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to say a word before he sits down?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. We have had a long debate here to-day. It has been obvious for a week that at the bottom of all this debate is the apprehension of the republican party to go into executive session because they have a quarrel among themselves which they dare not face, while they are making the country believe that we are filibustering. They brought up Louisiana yesterday, and they have waved the bloody shirt to-day. They are willing to adjourn now. They dare not make a test, because they dare not go into executive session to face the differences they have among themselves. I hope we shall give them another trial, and that before the Senator from Georgia sits down he will move to go into executive session in order to see if they dare venture upon it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I was about to conclude by moving that the Senate adjourn; but at the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have made the motion at the instance of another gentleman and cannot withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. You do not want to hear the reply.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You will have chances to reply, plenty of them.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to ask permission to put a question to the Senator from Georgia. Does he really mean after the speech he has made, leveled at the Senator from Massachusetts, to insist upon a motion to cut off reply?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. BECK. I do. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will have time to-morrow.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me say to the Senator from New York that I never seek to cut anybody off from anything.

Mr. CONKLING. So I thought.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not that style of man; but I want the Senator from New York to understand that I was making a reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, which under the rules ought to end the debate. But I do not care how much the Senator from Massachusetts speaks. As I had the floor, I made the motion at the instance of the Senator from Kentucky, and I simply felt that the question as to whether it should be withdrawn or not was with him and not with me.

Mr. BECK. What there is——

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator pardon me one moment? I do not rise in behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is quite abundantly able to take care of himself; I rise in my own behalf to remind the Senator from Georgia that nothing in the Senate is more unusual than for a Senator to make a speech (I do not criticise it at this moment) such as the Senator from Georgia has made, and when the Senator aimed at rises to reply, to submit and insist upon a motion which is not debatable. I do not think either of these Senators on reflection will do that.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have said to the Senator from New York plainly and distinctly that I have no desire on earth myself to cut off the Senator from Massachusetts now or at any time.

Mr. CONKLING. But your motion does cut him off.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But I have made the motion not at my own instance, but at the instance of the Senator from Kentucky, who can dispose of it as he pleases.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not the Senator his own keeper?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. So far as I am concerned, I withdraw it; but I think the Senator from Kentucky has a right to renew it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I made the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts now has the floor.

Mr. BECK. But I made the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Kentucky has not the floor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I gave the Senator from Kentucky the floor, and I must confess honestly I regard it as his motion.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Georgia has no right to give the Senator from Kentucky the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair apportions the floor, and not the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say that I do not desire to cut off any debate——

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor, I think. I do not see why the Senator should try to cut me off by asking me to yield to him. I have the floor, I believe, Mr. President.

Mr. BECK. I have no right to make the motion if the Chair decides against me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia made the motion and withdrew it; and thereupon the Chair recognized the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I will not apply to the Senator from Georgia the famous sentence in which Burke spoke of a parliamentary antagonist, in which he said he had meanly sneaked out of a difficulty into which he had proudly strutted; but I will say that I never heard a more lame attempt to shuffle out of a position into which the Senator advanced with the sounding of trumpets and the firing of guns. He rose in the Senate this morning and entered upon this debate, consuming, I should think, two hours, (but his speech might have seemed long to his hearers when it was not more than one,) by a lecture to the republican party of this country upon two matters—one, that we were about to enter upon a coalition with certain unworthy persons at the South, as he styled them in substance though not in words; and the other, that our reconstruction policy had created great mischief to the South and that especially after the war the emissaries of the republican party had sought to persuade the negroes that we were their friends and that their former masters were their enemies. With every form of amplification and reiteration and severity of adjective the Senator undertook to drive those charges into the republican party. The only diversity which his speech contained was that every other sentence was a testimonial to himself and his own fairness and integrity and wisdom.

I sat in my seat without the slighest intention of taking part in this debate, (which is under the charge of my colleague, so much fitter to govern it than I am,) until I could not stand it any longer, when I rose and proceeded to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the men who were "falsely" charged with being the enemies of the negro had within six or eight years of the time when that reconstruction policy was determined upon endeavored to spread slavery into all the Territories of this country; that they then fought a four year's war the sole purpose of which was the fastening forevermore of the collar around the necks and the gyves around the wrists of this race to whom they were so friendly; and that then they had resisted one by one every one of the three great amendments securing the equality of rights and the liberty and citizenship of this race; in every one of which matters the Senator from Georgia was an earnest partisan of the democratic position. I submit to him that that was a legitimate answer to his speech. I also pointed out that after the thirteenth amendment was adopted and ratified, the leading democratic States of the South passed laws contrived with devilish ingenuity to re-enslave that race which the Constitution of the United States declared free; that they sold them and their wives and their children, giving their old masters the preference, for the crime of being out of work.

When the Senator taunts me and my associates that we sent men down into the South in 1865, 1866, and 1867, who falsely told the negroes that we were their friends and that he was their enemy, is it not a legitimate answer to point to what you were doing at that very time? The Senator seems to think that he can stand up in the face of the American people and persuade men that black is white and that white is black; that the man who votes for whipping men and women and keeping them in slavery forevermore, and re-enslaving them when the Constitution of their country makes them free, and who resists every step to embody in the Constitution of the United States the great rights which belong to all humanity, is the friend of the negro and his freedom, and the men who accomplished these things his enemy. He accompanies it with a little private history, in which he asks us also to believe that the men who cast votes for ordinances of secession are Union men; that men who introduce measures in the confederate congress to shoot at sight northern soldiers if negroes are employed in our service are men who are in favor of friendly, moderate relations between the two sections; that men who defend Andersonville are champions of humanity; and then he undertakes to give to me and to give in advance of his act to the new Senator from Virginia, lectures on personal consistency and political propriety, and to say "Oh, tut, tut, do not go into these old discussions." Does the Senator suppose that the political history of this country is a monopoly of the democratic party, and that when we are taunted and stung and challenged by his setting forth our iniquities we are not at least entitled to a reply?

I met the Senator's lecture, of the severity of which perhaps he was not conscious, of the assumption of which he perhaps was not conscious, by saying to him, which I repeat, that I challenge him to name a single great measure which has affected the condition of the colored race or the policy of reconstruction, in regard to which he dares now refuse to confess that he was all wrong at the time and that we were all right. He says that the laws which I read were passed under the belief of the white democrats that it was dangerous to have this class of negroes, whom they knew all about and we knew nothing about, in freedom as citizens; and that is his excuse. When I asked him, "Well, were you right or were we right?" the answer was, "Oh, I was altogether mistaken." The men who thought that friendship for the negro consisted in sending his children to school, in securing him the ownership of land, in securing him the right to vote, in teaching him that God had given him that right to vote and that no human power could hereafter take it away from him, were his enemies, according to the Senator from Georgia, and the men who sought to bind anew the shackles about his limbs were his friends; you have been mistaken all your life.

The learned Senator shuffles off from the great measures which find their place in statutes and constitutions, and upon which the history of this country is planted. We placed those rights of the negro as a rock of solid granite in the Constitution itself, and I say to the honorable Senator from Georgia and to those who, with him, are trying to hold on to a slowly dying cause, "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder;" and parties, both North and South, may properly take heed of the admonition. I say again, the Senator from Georgia shuffles off. "Oh, yes, the thirteenth amendment was all right; the suppression of the rebellion was all right; the keeping slavery out of the Territories was all right; the giving the negro education, and land, and the vote, was all right; the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were all right; the taking away from the State governments the powers which they were using to pass these wicked laws was all right; but there is some vague notion of a reconstruction policy, not a single measure of which I can quote, not a single act of which I can express, in regard to which you were all wrong." A gentleman who stands up, and a party that stands up, to acknowledge in the face of the American people a series of mistakes upon the greatest question ever submitted to a free people, the question of the rights and the condition of five million people under their constitution and laws, has not fitted himself very well for a lecturer on political sagacity or political consistency.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not think it is necessary to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, except to remark, and I want the country to understand it, that I have said nothing whatever such as he has reported me as saying. The Senator has simply rehearsed what he has said perhaps a hundred times, which was never true at any one time he ever said it.

Mr. BECK. I rise for the purpose of renewing the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will make that motion presently. Before doing so I desire to give what is my deliberate opinion, that the republican party, with all their pretensions of anxiety to elect officers of the Senate, have been postponing matters from day to day for a week with no earnest desire to proceed; that they are prepared to adjourn now in my opinion; they have been prepared to adjourn at any moment when the ordinary dinner hour arrives; they have encouraged the attack on Louisiana and the raking up of the filth that for ten years we know has existed in the politics of that State; they are again to-day bringing up and waving the bloody shirt over the country as though these questions were now involved, when the fact is that they have resisted the consideration of executive business because of such serious complications among themselves that they have not dared to face the issue that the President has called upon them to meet.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. I will yield.

Mr. DAWES. I give the Senator my word that I will move myself to go into executive session in ten minutes after you adopt the pending resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. The Senator knows very well that the pending resolution cannot be adopted, certainly not so long as the republican party seeks to attach itself to the repudiators of the country. We cannot afford to allow the Senator from Massachusetts to so far disgrace the party he represents as to ally itself with any such organization as that. My great regard for the Senator from Massachusetts has made me defend him for the last three or four days against the possibility that such a thing might be charged to him. I have served under him so long, and have obeyed him so long, and have been scolded by him so often—and he behaved to me better then, at the other end of the Capitol, than he does now—that I confess some admiration for him and some apprehension of his powers.

I desire now that we shall go into executive session and by confirming the nominations that have been sent to us get men to carry on the business of the Government. The Supreme Court has adjourned, I understand, four times within the past ten days for the want of a quorum. There are very many vacancies now in the public service that we should fill at once. Let us pass upon these great questions, and then come back into open session if you desire. There are four treaties pending to which the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] has been calling attention over and over again. When you have attended to these things, there is nothing to prevent you from again coming into open session and taking up this question.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is not conscious of how much time he has consumed himself in these dilatory motions. We could have passed every one of these resolutions four or five days ago if it had not been for him, and had all the nominations confirmed in the Senate. The Senator is not conscious of the delay he is creating himself. I am astonished at him.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have proposed in the feeble efforts I have made to prevent the thing from being done of which I have spoken, to prevent the combination that unfortunately the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] because of his great respectability, has been made the organ of the caucus to seek to impose upon the country. I think a gentleman of less standing might have failed long ago. I was about to move to recommit the whole resolution to the caucus, but I will not. I desire to say, however, and I say it in all seriousness, that I believe now and I have believed for a week that there has been no earnest effort on the other side to make a contest as to whether this thing could be done or not. I know they cannot pass this resolution and elect these men. I know the power does not exist in them to do it. The Senator from Massachusetts knows it. The gentlemen on the other side know it. They do not care about it. That is not their object at all, but they are afraid to go into executive session to develop the difference of opinion among themselves, and I am now urging and pressing them to do it.

Mr. DAWES rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. We intend also the country shall know who prevents it.

Mr. BECK. The country shall know that the republican party are so divided about the policy that ought to be pursued in regard to the great nominations now pending before the Senate that they dare not consider the objects for which the President called the Senate together, and that under the pretense of turning out two or three good officers and putting in repudiators and others they are seeking to make a divergence, and they are supplementing that with discussions on Louisiana and on the bloody shirt and on issues about carpet-baggers and negroes and Freedman's Bureau agents, and other matters that have been buried out of sight long ago, and they are as much concealed as the ostrich thinks he is when his head is under the sand while his great body is exposed in full view.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the Senator would only let us try it.

Mr. BECK. I will, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. DAWES. The business before the Senate is what the Senator's trouble is——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BECK. I have asked for the yeas and nays on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-day with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who was obliged to leave the Chamber.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] But for that pair, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	McPherson,
Brown,	Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Butler,	Farley,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Call,	George,	Johnston,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater.

NAYS—30.

Allison,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Plumb,
Blair,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Teller.
Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—18.

Anthony,	Groome,	Saulsbury,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Hale,	Saunders,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Vance,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Garland,	Kellogg,	Vest,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has evidently made a new discovery, and in order that the Senator from Georgia, who has worn out the old themes and the old methods of opposition to the public business, and others like him, shall have an opportunity of rallying around this new discovery of the Senator from Kentucky and come here to-morrow morning with new vigor to discharge the public business now pending, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 31, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. PENDLETON. If there is nothing before the Senate just now, I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw the motion?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly I withdraw the motion if the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to take the floor.

Mr. DAWES. What is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall proceed to dispose of the pending question at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has withdrawn the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, the Chair understands.

Mr. PENDLETON. I withdrew the motion in order to enable the Senator from Pennsylvania to submit his remarks.

Mr. DAWES. I was going to ask the Senator from Ohio if he would not withdraw his motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I venture to intrude for a moment upon the attention of the Senate, and I feel reasonably assured that if I do not add to the information of this honorable body I will not detract from the good spirit which has heretofore marked this debate.

Since I find that my absence was the occasion for so much eloquence I am not sorry that I felt sufficiently unwell to ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to take upon himself the double duty of endurance for a few days.

I am back refreshed, and quite willing to extend the courtesy which I received to any other member of this body who may be in need of it, and I can safely promise that nobody on this side of the Senate will make speeches in prose or poetry at the expense of the absent Senator.

I cannot, however, allow my position, or that of the Senators acting with me, to be misrepresented, although done in the best of humor. After repeated votes had established that a majority of the members of this body desired to change its officers, our opponents announced by their acts as well as by their words that they had decided that a minority of this body was determined to retain the present officers. The issue was too plain to be misunderstood. We said that the majority had a right to decide that question. Our opponents said that the minority had the right to decide it. I said it seemed then to be a question of endurance, and I really do not see what else it can be pretended to be.

The general doctrine that the majority is entitled to rule is not called in question. The right of the majority of the Senate to elect its own officers is not called in question. The minority simply says to the majority, "We will not allow you to exercise your undoubted right, because we will resort to dilatory motions, to long and eloquent speeches, and to poetical quotations, until you are weary of the struggle and allow us to have our own way." My answer was and is, "We cannot afford to abandon the right of a majority to rule because the minority makes it a mere question of endurance, of how long we will endure dilatory motions and dilatory speeches." We must endure them just as long as the minority chooses to inflict them upon us.

The contest, however, in which we are engaged is not simply to secure the officers and employés to party friends, as the Senators on the other side pretend, nor is it solely a struggle of the majority to maintain its right to control the organization of the body. There is something higher than and above all this, something the great importance of which has not escaped the attention of our opponents here. It is the coming political contest in Virginia.

The Senator from Virginia who sits nearest me has terrified the old democratic régime of his State by his courageous bearing on this floor. They seem to have entertained a hope that with their maledictions still ringing in his ears he would forget his own purposes and save his democracy by consorting with the enemies of his people. Disappointed in their expectations, they appeal to southern Senators here to so cover him with opprobrium that his followers at home will not dare to share his fortunes. The republicans in this body and elsewhere see clearly that the assaults made upon him here are to punish him for his refusal to obey the orders issued to him. He has committed the unpardonable sin of doing that which his enemies only profess to do. He has made political slavery impossible in Virginia. He has championed the cause of honest elections. He is about to lead in a final struggle in the Old Dominion for obedience to law in elections. He has our sympathies in this good work. We know his good work in his State is giving to all citizens, black and white, equal rights before the law. In the coming State election the struggle will be a bitter one. I believe the right is going to prevail, for the law-abiding citizens of Virginia who were confederates will go into that great contest with the knowledge that our hearts are with them. Our colored friends in that State will be glad to see that we share their confidence in these well-tried friends, and they will continue to give General MAHONE the hearty support he has already earned and received at their hands. All Virginia will see that the great North fraternizes with all ex-confederates in the South who are known by their acts as well as by their words to be in favor of an honest ballot and a fair count.

The election of Colonel Riddleberger to a responsible office in this body will be the best proof that could be given that for all true men who uphold the laws the republican party has confidence, respect, and co-operation. We give our votes to that gentleman as an earnest that we are not sectional and that we have no prejudices on account of old conflicts. Whoever is right at the present time is our friend and we are his. This, and this only, is the "bargain" we have to offer to all our southern friends who will come out from the party of reaction and grow with the nation's growth. All that we ask is that they shall stand with us in favor of securing to each lawful voter the right to cast one free and unintimidated ballot and to have it honestly counted. We know, and our opponents know, that if Virginia takes her stand upon that platform the solid South is a thing of the past. And this is the true meaning of the present struggle.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I did not catch what the Senator from Pennsylvania said when he alluded to me, but I have such faith in his good taste that I know he used language only in the same good humor that I did the other day in reference to him. I am very glad to see him back in his seat. I know that he was impelled to leave the Senate by his being unwell; and to show the sincerity of my belief upon that question, I will state that I am perfectly willing to pair with him if his health at any time takes him away from here.

Mr. DAWES. Now I hope that we shall have a vote.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yesterday morning, with his accustomed ability, presented to the Senate reasons why he had presented the resolution which he offered, and I take it on behalf of the republican caucus. He said first, referring to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON:]

> The Senator has read with great force the sound sentiment expressed about the long continuance in office of the officers of the British Parliament. We struggled two years ago to convince the Senator and his associates of the force of that truth. We showed that the officers of this body had been long in service; and the Senators on the other side admitted that they had been faithful in service. We appealed to them then to adopt the sentiments which the Senator has produced to-day; but we appealed in vain. The majority of the Senate chose what we thought was an unwise departure from that sound doctrine which the Senator has presented to-day. I assure the Senator that just as soon as we can recover from that unwise departure on the part of the then majority in the Senate we shall adhere, with all the persistency that a majority is authorized by the Constitution to adhere, to the very sound doctrines that the Senator has promulgated to-day and keep in office, with the judgment of the country behind us, those faithful public servants who have been long tried and found efficient and faithful.

Following that are other remarks of the same sort. Struck forcibly with the doctrine of the Senator from Massachusetts that the purpose of the resolution which he had offered was to restore the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-Arms, the officers who were displaced by the democratic party two years ago and whom he declared to be faithful and efficient, I asked him this question:

> I understand the Senator from Massachusetts makes the point that the removal of officers of the Senate by the democratic party two years ago was unwise, and his purpose is to do away with that unwise act and restore them. Is that the point?
> Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.
> Mr. MAXEY. Then I would ask the Senator, was Sergeant-at-Arms French a capable and faithful officer?

I could not see for the life of me, if his purpose was to restore faithful and efficient officers, and if Sergeant-at-Arms French was such an officer, why he should not be proposed to be restored the same as the Secretary of the Senate. Then I said:

> I only want an answer to that question. If he was a capable and faithful officer and you wish to do away with this unwise act of his removal, why do you not restore him as you restore the old Secretary?
> Mr. DAWES. I will answer that question when we come to it. [Laughter.]
>
> Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We are at it now.
> Mr. DAWES. That is not the pending resolution. The pending resolution is that we proceed to the election of these officers, and whenever the resolution comes up to which the Senator makes allusion, if the Senator will move an amendment to that resolution he and I will discuss it.

After the very polite intimation which I received the other day from the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] not to disturb the arrangements which had been made by the republican party, I would be the last to propose an amendment to anything which they saw proper to offer here. Then I said:

> That is not the point, Mr. President. The Senator has made his own resolution and he says that he wants to do away with this unwise act.
> Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.
>
> Mr. MAXEY. And in support of that he proposes an entirely new man for Sergeant-at-Arms and keeps out the very man that he says it was unwise to turn out a year ago.
> Mr. DAWES. I do not propose any such thing. I propose to proceed to the election of officers of the Senate. The Senator from Texas is a little confused this morning.

When the Senator from Massachusetts offered this resolution to proceed to the election of Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-Arms he notified the Senate that he would follow that resolution by four others, one of which was to declare Mr. George C. Gorham Secretary of the Senate and another to declare Mr. Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms; so that the Senate was notified fully that the first resolution was merely formal, for the purpose of getting at the substantial point, the election of the Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and other officers. As I am reminded by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] these other resolutions were actually introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. Hence it is known to everybody that the discussion has proceeded upon the substantial point of removing the able and efficient Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms now holding office and replacing them by two others. That is the substantial question. The Senator appeared to think I had mistook the pending resolution. I was not at all confused. I knew perfectly well the resolution, and I knew perfectly well the object of that resolution, and always preferring substance to mere form I struck at the very point, which was the removal of these two officers and the election in their stead of Mr. Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger.

Either the Senator from Massachusetts is sincere in the statement which he has made or he is not; either the reasons which he assigned are good or they are not. If it be true that the purpose of the Senator who acts as the organ of the republican caucus is to do away with the work of the democratic party two years ago in the Senate and replace the present incumbents, then I ask, in the name of all reason, why it turns out, as the former Sergeant-at-Arms (Mr. French, who the Senator claims was efficient) had held his office for a long time—four years that I know of—(he held it when the Senator from Massachusetts and myself entered the Senate, and continued to hold it four years after)—why should he not be restored the same as the Secretary? If the Secretary of the Senate, under the theory of the gentleman, is to be replaced, why should not the Sergeant-at-Arms in like manner be replaced? There is something about that that it is difficult to comprehend. If Mr. French was an inefficient officer why not say so? If inefficient he ought not to be replaced. If he was inefficient, which I do not charge, and the Senator is honest in his proposition that a capable and faithful officer should not be removed, I ask if Mr. French was removed on account of inefficiency was he not rightfully removed? And if you have to-day a Sergeant-at-Arms who is capable and efficient, as all admit Mr. Bright to be—unquestionably efficient—then why under the Senator's own theory should the present Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Bright, be removed to be replaced by one who was never heard of by many in the Senate before the nomination was made? These things are difficult to comprehend. If the purpose was to put in republicans who had been faithful and true to their trust and their party, I ask how does it happen that this old and tried republican, the Sergeant-at-Arms who was removed two years ago, a man who has always proved true to his political faith, should be left out, overslaughed, set aside for one who has up to the present good hour been acting in direct antagonism to the republican party, as we understand it on this side?

But there is another point that I have heard much said about, and I desire to mention that. The Senator from Massachusetts, with that degree of solemnity of diction which he can adopt whenever he wants to carry through one of his own purposes, declares that he is in favor of a free ballot, a priceless ballot, and an honest count. During an active life no mortal man can find wherever directly or indirectly I violated or countenanced a violation of that grand doctrine, a free ballot, a priceless ballot, an honest count. The Senator says he is in favor of carrying out the will of the majority. He says, "I have a constitutional infirmity of submitting to the will of the majority; I was so brought up, and I cannot depart from it easily in my old days." I am in favor of the will of the majority. When the times change it does seem that men change with them. In November, 1876, when the democratic party by a majority of 8,000 had carried the State of Louisiana, and by hundreds the State of Florida, the will of the majority was ruthlessly set aside and held for naught by the party with which the Senator from Massachusetts acts. That great majority of 8,000 melted away before returning-board processes, and on paper a majority was erected for the republican party in those two States; and by that change, brought about as only republican returning boards know how to bring it about, the entire result of the presidential election was changed, and Mr. Hayes was declared elected. Was the Senator in favor of carrying out the will of the majority then? But to that he might reply, the will of the majority was obtained by crooked methods. We investigated the matter, and upon that investigation we found the result to be as I have stated it.

Mr. President, I believe there was a fair and honest majority in both Louisiana and Florida for Tilden, and there is now all through the length and breadth of this land a belief, whether well or ill founded I do not say, that the majority of the republican party in the Senate was obtained by crooked methods. The verdict of the people is written across the skies. We, exercising that right which belongs to us, want the will of the majority fairly expressed to be the will of the Senate. We are in favor of a free ballot, a priceless ballot, and an honest count. We want a ballot absolutely priceless, a ballot not procured by money or other thing of value, not by patronage or power, but an absolutely free, priceless ballot, and the democratic party is at all times willing and anxious to have its methods scrutinized. Power by crooked methods is not worth the sacrifice of honor and manhood to obtain it. Whether the majority of the Senate was obtained fairly or unfairly I know not. Upon that I express no opinion; but I do say that those who stand by us, a great column of the great American people, believe that the majority was obtained by methods strange and unusual in the Senate of the United States, and they demand that the matter shall be investigated. The democratic party so believe, and falling back upon our rights to have the will of the majority expressed, to have a free ballot, a priceless ballot, and an honest count, we stand here to-day for the purpose of securing that great, inestimable boon for the American people, that this body shall preserve its integrity, that if there be the slightest suspicion even that suspicion shall be removed.

Juvenal tells us that an act which may be the precedent for the commission of crime shocks even its perpetrator; that in the great court of conscience, with all the facts known to the perpetrator of that crime, the verdict will be guilty, and notwithstanding that by the fallax urna of a corrupt prætor the guilty may go unwhipped of justice, yet over and above him is suspended in his conscience always a viewless thong, a scourge which day and night, waking or sleeping, threatens to lash him. If the transaction whereby the majority was obtained be just, if it be fair, and I do not say that it was not, yet when that suspicion has been cast upon it, as it has been, because we get it daily through the press and everywhere, then it seems to me there should be here but one purpose, full time for full investigation. If the suspicion is unjust, then there will be full vindication. If just, the fact should be known. For the honor of the Senate I trust that everything is fair. There is no necessity for this proceeding under the pending resolution. There is a necessity that the business of the country should go on, that the purposes for which we met, action upon treaties and action upon nominations, should be carried on. The Supreme Court has to close its session daily, as I am informed, for want of a quorum; and here we stand refusing to act upon the nomination of a justice of that court which has been sent to us. The fifth circuit, wherein I reside, is to-day without a circuit judge. Great offices throughout the length and breadth of the country needing to be filled are kept in abeyance by the refusal of the Senate to act upon the nominations sent by the President. That business is necessary. This business is not necessary. Then the question recurs, if it is not necessary, and this other business is necessary, why this haste to push the pending resolution?

It seems to me that these are questions which will be asked by the American people. All that we ask in this whole matter is a fair, open, and just settlement of this question. If you have the majority which you claim, you will not lose by delaying this proceeding until the first Monday in December. There is no necessity for it at this time. We have an efficient Secretary of the Senate and an efficient Sergeant-at-Arms, and that fact is not disputed. You do not want to undo the work which was done by the democratic party two years ago, for if you did you would restore the same officers. You do not propose to do that. These things attract attention; they will attract attention; and it is not strange that we at least desire to look into this matter.

Mr. President, I have said thus much in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, because my question yesterday was sincerely asked and the Senator on that occasion declined to answer it. I have this morning given fully the reasons why I asked the question.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I owe an apology to the Senate for so often intruding myself upon it. I hope it will bear me witness that I do not volunteer in the debate, for I had much rather proceed to business than occupy any time of the Senate in talk.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] complains this morning that while I expressed an entire willingness to answer his question when the resolution to which it pertained should be up for consideration, the idea suggested by him that I had better discuss it before it came up for consideration led me to infer that he was a little confused, because I knew the general clearness of the Senator's conception of the propriety of debate would have led him to say "whenever that resolution does come up I propound that question to the Senator from Massachusetts." But he complains this morning that I did not answer his question out of time. I do not like to rest under that imputation; and therefore, though it be not in the proper time, I will answer the question out of my great personal regard to the Senator from Texas. I will tell him plainly why I did not in my resolution propose to restore to his old place the former Sergeant-at-Arms. I would have been very glad to have done it and to have testified by that act, as I do by the first resolution which I offered, my disapprobation of the proceedings of two years ago. So striking and marked were they in the displacement of so faithful a public servant as the former Sergeant-at-Arms of this body that he was called immediately into the public service and is now engaged in such responsible and arduous public duties as render it impossible to take him from them without damage to the public service. And when I came to look about for those men that had been turned adrift by the unwise and anti-civil-service-reform policy (in which I was so sorry to see the champion of civil-service reform on the other side joining) I found it necessary to leave the able and honest Sergeant-at-Arms of this body in the public service where he had been called as a mark of appreciation of his honesty and fidelity by the executive department of this Government. I could not take him thence, and I was under the necessity of putting another name in that place.

I hope my friend understands it.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether or not the old Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. French, was consulted about this, and whether or not he desired to be restored to his old place?

Mr. DAWES. The public good was consulted. None of these parties were consulted by me; I never passed a word with any of them on the subject. I never saw any person in reference to the propriety of inserting the names in the resolutions which I did insert. I thought I could present to the Senate as candidates for these places gentlemen of such integrity and efficiency and public worth and influence as to commend themselves even to the minority on the other side, if it must needs be that the unwise work of two years ago was to be undone. I fondly anticipated that our friends on the other side, if they found it necessary to correct the mistakes of two years ago, would gladly unite with me in putting such efficient and honorable and honest faithful public servants into these places as I proposed.

One word more, Mr. President. The Senator says I announced yesterday as something new, or as it seemed to him something new—for I have never heard him express his opinion upon it so clearly and forcibly as he has to-day—that I was for a free, honest, unintimidated ballot and a fair count, and that I had a constitutional infirmity of submitting to the will of the majority. That is not a new doctrine, I hope. It certainly ought not to be in this body, and I trust my friend has not for the last twenty years lived in such an atmosphere that that idea is new to him.

He wants to know, if I do really entertain such a doctrine as that, what I think of the proceedings in 1876, when he says that the man who was not clothed with the executive authority of this nation received many hundred thousand majority of the popular vote and eight thousand majority of the popular vote in Louisiana?

Sir, if I had believed that in 1876, or if I believed it now, I would have joined with my friend from Texas in denouncing every step which led to the inauguration of the late President of the United States. It is because I believed then and believe now that a majority of the voters of this country did cast their votes for Rutherford B. Hayes that I did then the little that it was for me to do, and that I countenanced and assisted the result and stood by the administration of President Hayes. The difference between me and the Senator from Texas is this: the Senator counts all pieces of paper that are found in a ballot-box as ballots; I count nothing as a ballot that does not have behind it a free, honest, upright voter.

Mr. MAXEY. One word——

Mr. DAWES. Sir, there is a ticket [exhibiting]——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DAWES. In one moment, when I get through with this idea. There [exhibiting] is a ticket containing a whole list of presidential electors in 1876 which in any northern State would have been so long, [indicating,] four or five times the length of this paper, [holding up a tissue ballot less than an inch and a half long.] Thousands of these tissue ballots were found in a single ballot-box with nothing behind them but the villainous hand that put them there. [Indications of applause.] Sir, I do not count them ballots. It is because there was an attempt to substitute pieces of paper for freemen's votes in ballot-boxes in some States and to fraudulently forge and substitute false returns for true ones in another State and to put the blunderbuss in place of the freeman's flag in other States that I attempted in 1876 to do what lay in my power to stand by what I supposed every honest freeman in this land understands to be the meaning of a ballot. Sir, it is when we undertake to mock the freeman with these pieces of paper; it is when we undertake to compel him to wade through blood to the ballot-box and when we find him as silent when the day of election comes as those are who lie in the bloody graves they filled in 1876, that I feel called upon to remind the Senator from Texas that there is a difference between pieces of paper in the ballot-box and the vote of the freeman that—

> Executes a freeman's will,
> As lightning does the will of God.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts says that he is in favor of a free ballot, a priceless ballot, and an honest count, and intimates that that to me is something new. Sir, I heard of that doctrine, practiced upon it, and believed it long years ago, before I ever heard of the Senator from Massachusetts.

He says that those ballots such as he has handed up to the Reporter of the Senate for insertion in the RECORD procured the majority of 8,000 in Louisiana in 1876; that he was in favor of the inauguration of Mr. Hayes because he had been fairly and honestly elected. Mr. President, these little ballots which execute the will of God "as snow-flakes fall upon the sod," to which the Senator has referred, were amply sufficient under his authority to elect Mr. Hayes, and yet these same ballots were not sufficient to elect Mr. Packard governor of Louisiana, although Mr. Packard got more of these little ballots than Mr. Hayes's electors.

Sir, it is difficult for any one, when he attempts to uphold such a high crime as was perpetrated against the liberties of the people in disfranchising two States of this Union and thereby inaugurating as President a man not elected, to be consistent. If, as was declared once by the present distinguished Secretary of State, then a Senator on this floor, Mr. Hayes was elected, Mr. Packard was elected. Mr. Hayes was declared by that wonderful returning board to be elected, but Mr. Packard was not. It is difficult for any one to comprehend how, when you undertake through your returning board to elect a man, you can set aside the ballot which is the free expression of the voter and executes "the will of God," as the Senator expressed it—when you undertake to set aside and hold that for naught, for partisan purposes, it is difficult to maintain and uphold your position. If one was elected President, the other was elected governor. You leave the democratic governor-elect in position; you turn out the President-elect from position. How can this be reconciled? And yet it was the same voters, the same election precincts, the same ballot-boxes, and the same returning board. Sir, it was necessary to elect not by ballots but to set aside and hold for naught ballots and elect by a subservient returning board. We of the democratic party here, because we do believe in a free ballot, a priceless ballot, and a fair count, are met with such an argument as that which has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Mr. President, the argument will not do. As long as time lasts this crime against the ballot in Louisiana and Florida will be held to be the highest crime perpetrated against free government.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. MAXEY. Does the Senator desire to go on?

Mr. DAWES. No; I only wanted to answer the Senator's question. I will do it at any time most agreeable to him.

Mr. MAXEY. I am perfectly ready to hear the Senator now.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator wanted to know of me why it was if the Hayes electors were chosen in Louisiana that Packard was not. I believe that was the question. His idea is that Packard was as much elected as the Hayes electors were. I agree with him; I agree that Packard was just as much elected as the Hayes electors; and I believe that a majority of all the pieces of paper that had a free voter behind them were for him; but no returning board that I ever knew of declared that Packard was not elected. But we heard the other day how the Louisiana Lottery Company upset Packard and put Nicholls in, and in gratitude for that the democracy made it immortal. That is how. If the Senator wants to know how Packard is not governor to-day, let him inquire of his own friends in Louisiana, who declared that because it was the Louisiana Lottery Company to which they owed the existence of the Nicholls government they would ingraft that lottery into the fundamental law of the State to abide as long as democracy in the State.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator, just as he did yesterday, when it suits his purpose gets off on a side issue all the time. I will reply to him in one word. He puts fully as much faith and I think a great deal more in Eliza Pinkston and her returning board than in the ballots of the people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the pending resolution be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Ohio I think made a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio made such a motion, but withdrew it, and yielded the floor to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BECK. I renew it in his name now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I did not know any one else desired to speak. I will withdraw the motion, as the Senator from Florida is about to take the floor. I was not aware of it before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I feel a little like apologizing to the Senate this morning for undertaking to consume a portion of its very valuable time. I have never risen here without some little sensibility of that kind, knowing that there was a great deal more to do than simply to listen to any observations that I might feel disposed to address to the Senate; and I am not now on my feet, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a speech, but I think it is due to myself and to the State that I partly represent here that I should say a few words in regard to what was said the other day by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] touching the question of repudiation in Florida.

I find on looking into his speech this morning for the first time, that my State has been classed among the list of repudiating Commonwealths. This, I know, will be news to the people of my State, for if there is anything upon which they have prided themselves more than another, it has been the fidelity with which they have clung to their public and private honor. The temptation has long existed to repudiation; but recognizing the great fact that we were a young and rising community and that without public credit we could not hope to build up the waste places within our borders, saying nothing of the virtue of the question, our own self-interest has prompted us to maintain our public obligations.

According to the schedule presented by the junior Senator from Virginia, Florida is charged with having repudiated $4,120,911 of public indebtedness. Her public debt is put down as having been in 1860 $4,120,000. This will be certainly news to the people of Florida, for we were without any public debt in 1860. In 1865, when the provisional government was turned over to Governor Reed in the presence of the military authorities of the United States as witnesses, there was a little debt of some four hundred thousand dollars that had been contracted from necessity during the period of Governor Walker's administration. That was all the debt then. The bonded debt after that was increased, and the burdens of the people became very heavy under the administration which followed. The public debt of Florida has risen from a little less than half a million dollars when the republicans took control to something over a million and a half, if my memory serves me, for I have not the exact data before me, and that is the whole of it.

There is a great deal included in that bonded indebtedness which we could have honorably repudiated, but we did not do it, and the interest on the Florida State debt has been promptly and regularly paid since the government went into democratic hands. It is true that after the change of the State government from the democrats to the republicans a new system of improvements was provided for. The republican legislature, inspired by corrupt and bad men, enacted a law under which and by which some four millions of bonds of the State of Florida were put upon the market. It provided that the principal existing railroad system, which it consolidated into one line and made a new corporation of, should issue to the State four millions of its bonds, although its property was already encumbered to the better part of its value, and went on to provide that in exchange for these bonds which this corporate creature was to issue a like number of bonds of the State should be delivered to it, it being presided over by a gentleman who found his way there from North Carolina, but who, as I believe, had no permanent connection with that State, a Mr. Littlefield, who had attained some notoriety in railroad matters. There were issued to the chief of this corporation, this great fraud of a corporation, for it was but little else, $4,000,000 of bonds of the State in lieu of $4,000,000 of bonds to be delivered by the corporation to the State as security against any loss that might possibly accrue. It was provided under the bill that this railroad should be extended throughout the western portion of Florida, and the purpose of the issue of bonds was to complete this work. These bonds were issued in violation of every principle of law and of the constitution; they went into the hands of these adventurers, who took them into a foreign market, sold them for sterling money, and never built one foot of the road. I believe they never meant to build any of it. They got those $4,000,000 of bonds through a republican legislature, carried them to Holland, sold them there, turned over their own bonds to the State, which were comparatively worthless, because the road was already involved for nearly its value, and saddled this indebtedness upon the people of Florida or attempted to do so.

This matter gave rise to very long, protracted litigation. When the government came into democratic hands the people of Florida, anxious to maintain their public faith, anxious to fulfill every honest obligation that their servants had contracted, rose up as one man and said that this fraudulent debt should not be paid by them. I indorsed their position with respect to it, and I indorse it now. The question went before the courts. The supreme court of the State, which has been as everybody knows a republican tribunal, presided over by republicans, decided that those bonds were null and void, that there was no authority for their issue; and that judgment, in a case that subsequently reached the Supreme Court of the United States, as I understand it, was in all respects affirmed. But anxious to do all that was possible to be done for the relief of the honest, bona fide holders into whose hands these fraudulent securities had passed on the other side of the water—and I never think of them unless it is with feelings of sympathy and tenderness when I remember the terrible fraud that was perpetrated upon those honest foreigners who had earned their money by the sweat of their brows, and who by the representations of dishonest men had been induced to invest their little earnings in these so-called Florida securities, with the seal of the State upon them—I say that the State, anxious to do all that was possible to be done for the relief of the innocent holders of these four million bonds, said to them, The State cannot be bound by this iniquity; we hold the securities transferred to us by the railroad corporation, the Littlefield corporation; they are a lien upon the property after all the pre-existing debts are paid, and all that we can do for you will be to transfer the bonds that were taken by the republican administration to the holders of the securities for which they were exchanged. Such an arrangement at that time was made, I think, after the courts had decided that those obligations did not constitute any valid demand upon the people of Florida, and that they were in no way bound to pay them. Not one dollar of the honest indebtedness of that State has been repudiated.

I find in the statement contained in the speech of the junior Senator from Virginia that Florida's obligations in 1842 are put down at a certain number of dollars. Why, sir, Florida was not a State in 1842. Florida was admitted into the Union in March, 1845, and at the time that these figures refer to she was in a territorial condition. This shows the inaccuracy of statement that characterizes a grave paper which is intended to affect the credit and the standing of a southern Commonwealth; for I am free to say that no man on this floor has a higher appreciation of the advantages and benefits of public credit than I have, and when the time comes (which I hope it never may) for decisive action on questions of that kind, I shall be found among the last who are disposed to undervalue it.

Mr. President, after all that the people of my State suffered from mismanagement and misgovernment, I think we have a right to congratulate ourselves over the deliverance from the misrule of the past, and I think that the American people throughout the length and breadth of this land ought to feel an honest pride in the progress that has been made in States of the South like mine, because everything that has been accomplished there in the way of improving our material prosperity has gone to swell the wealth and the importance of our common country.

I say the people of Florida have good reason to feel attached to the democratic policy and the democratic party of that State, because it has been through them and by them that the only practical reform of late years has been secured. The republicans had control of the State for eight and a half years; and what record have they left behind them? How did they husband the resources of that impoverished people? How did they discharge the high duties of government which they assumed under the reconstruction laws? Did they practice economy? Did they distinguish themselves by putting into high place men of known capacity and integrity? Did they lift up the standard of popular government and make it a source of pride and satisfaction to the American people?

However much we may be gratified with these things in other quarters of the Union, nothing of that kind can be claimed for republican rule in the section from which I come. I regret it; I regret it sincerely, because if there is one thing more than another that I would desire to see, it would be both parties in all sections of the country rivaling each other in those qualities and capabilities for government which go to advance our popular system in the estimation of the world; but the things that have happened there have been calculated to give emphasis to the arguments that have long been used against our popular system. Ignorance and incapacity, neglect of the public affairs, disregard of the interests of the people, have marked those governments at every step in their progress.

After the people of my State succeeded in overthrowing this system of so-called republican rule, they entered upon the practical work of reform. They never repudiated a bond. They knew that those bonds represented an indebtedness which ought not be paid, but they said to the people of the country, "we will provide by taxation for interest upon them." They went to work and they increased in efficiency and discipline their public school system, and the report of the superintendent of education in my State for last year, which has been so fairly commented upon by the leading press of the North, goes to show that with our little resources there, having only $31,000,000 of property, not more than one-fifteenth of the taxable wealth of Philadelphia, we educated in the common schools forty-two thousand whites and over forty thousand blacks during the year, and that at a cost to our State of something over $150,000. Sir, everything has been done in the way of reform which has been possible; and to show by a few figures the difference between the management of the two parties in my little State I will refer to a statement which I have before me.

The republican party turned over the State government in 1877; they took possession in 1868; but I will take the last three years of their domination and compare them with the three years of democratic rule.

In 1874 the State tax—that was under republican administration—was $427,603.77; in 1875 the State tax was $408,584.71; in 1876 the State tax was $380,858.69, making a total of $1,217,047.17 for those three years. Now began democratic rule. In 1877 the State tax was $327,098.87; in 1878 the State tax was $284,592.28; in 1879 the State tax was $237,625.14, making a total of $849,316.29 in those three years, showing that in three years of democratic rule and policy we saved to the people of that little Commonwealth $367,730.88. This is the very best commentary that can be put upon our administrations of government, that while we have met every public obligation, discharged every public duty, administered every law, educated the colored people and maintained their schools better than ever before, in three years we saved to the tax-payers of that State over $368,000, which the republicans in the three years before squandered by extravagance. And what, I ask you, Mr. President, do we live for under government except it is to secure protection to life and property at the lowest possible cost, and that party which can bring home protection to society and to man at the smallest cost upon his labor or his income is the party that ought to receive the support of the American people.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, I was out of my seat yesterday when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] in his researches into ancient history, introduced and read from certain statutes passed in the State of Louisiana in 1865. The Senator said:

> When the war ended under the administration of Andrew Johnson the democratic whites of the South were suffered to take possession of the State governments of the Gulf States and some of the others.
> What then happened? In those States these good white men, who so love the negro, proceeded to pass through their various State Legislatures laws intending to overthrow practically the effect of that amendment, and to reduce the colored people again to slavery. I have some of them here.

Mr. President, before reading these laws I wish to state briefly what did occur, at least in my State, immediately after the war ended. We found, those of us who were in the confederate army, when we returned to our homes, that a State government was in existence under the constitution of 1864, which had been framed under the military government of General Banks with the authority of the President, and which had been adopted and ratified by the votes of United States soldiers and a trifling portion of the people in the city of New Orleans and in the military posts immediately around the city. We found in office under that constitution a governor who was a republican and who always had been a Union man. In the proudest days of secession, when it prevailed all over the State of Louisiana, and when it required courage and determination to oppose it or at least not to be of it, this man had been a Union man, and his devotion to the Union had been rewarded by making him governor of the State. We confederate soldiers when we came to our homes, those of us who were not disfranchised and were permitted to vote were called upon to exercise the elective franchise, and to elect and put in office a new State government under the provisions of that constitution, and under the proclamation issued by that governor. Instead of (as the Senator says) attempting to put in power again those who were fresh from the battle-fields and rebellion, we nominated this man for the office of governor who had been nominated also by the republican party of that State, and we elected him over the last governor of the State of Louisiana during secession, who was not only one of the most gallant and popular men that Louisiana ever produced, but was the idol of the soldiers who returned again to citizenship and to cast their votes. I took an active part in supporting the re-election of this gentleman. I admit it now as one of my political sins for which I trust some day to be forgiven. I instance it to show that in Louisiana at least there was no proscriptive feeling on the part of the returned rebels, on the part of the people who were restored to power through the proclamation of protection of President Johnson.

Mr. President, we elected a Legislature, and that Legislature was democratic. We elected a governor, and at first and for a long time this governor and the Legislature were in thorough accord. This, when that Legislature met, be it remembered, was before the adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. The colored man had been recently released from slavery; but he had not been made a citizen; he had not been made a voter.

When this Legislature met in November, 1865, some of the colored men in the State of Louisiana had not been emancipated from slavery more than five or six months, because a large portion of the State of Louisiana was under confederate control during the whole war. When the war ended, agriculturists and planters went to work to rebuild their fortunes and to recultivate their waste lands. They called around them and sought to employ their labor, because each class was dependent upon the other, and each had a common interest in the agricultural development of the country.

Among the planters at that time were a large number of northern men who after the war had established their fortunes in Louisiana, bought or rented plantations, and gone into the cultivation of cotton and sugar. What was the planter to do with this labor, newly emancipated, without citizenship, utterly ignorant of their own rights, utterly ignorant of the rights of employers, utterly unable to provide for themselves, utterly unable to do justice to those who would employ and feed them and pay them for their labor? It was a problem to consider.

These people, even under the constitution of 1864, (framed by republicans,) were not citizens and were not voters. Under the laws of the State they had no right to make contracts. Therefore it became necessary to enact laws which should permit planters to contract for labor and should permit laborers to contract with the employers, to protect the planter in his contract and to protect the laborer in his, and those laws were passed which the Senator alluded to yesterday. They are very short, and I will read them to show that there was nothing in them which proposed to interfere with the manhood or freedom of the recently emancipated slave, or which proposed—it was the last thing in the intention of any man who voted for these laws and helped enact them, as I did, being a member of that Legislature—to interfere with their freedom or their emancipation or any right which they might have, undefined as those rights at that time were. The first law was "to prevent trespassing."

Be it enacted, &c., That whosoever shall enter upon any plantation without the permission of the owner or agent, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to be arrested and brought before any court of competent jurisdiction, and upon proof of the fact shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $100, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding one month.

Is this an unusual law? Was it not necessary at a time when a large number of people were unsettled and nomadic in their habits, not knowing their rights; when the country was overrun with tramps and discharged soldiers; when this large body of newly-emancipated laborers were floating about, uncertain where to pitch their habitations or their homes? Was it unwise or improper to pass such a law as this to prevent trespassing on private property?

The next act was "to provide for the punishment of persons for tampering with, persuading or enticing away, harboring, feeding, or secreting laborers, servants, or apprentices." It provided:

That any one who shall persuade or entice away, feed, harbor, or secrete any person who leaves his or her employer, with whom she or he has contracted, or is assigned to live, or any apprentice who is bound as an apprentice, without the permission of his or her employer, said person or persons so offending shall be liable for damages to the employer, and also upon conviction thereof shall be subject to pay a fine of not more than $500 nor less than $10.

This was to prevent the interference with contracts made by employers with this people. It was to prevent one employer seeking to entice away this class of labor from another, depriving that other who might have invested his capital in planting a crop and improving it of the power to continue the cultivation of that crop. It sought at the same time to protect the rights of employers and employés.

The third law was "to punish in certain cases the employers of laborers or apprentices." It was an act for the protection of the laborers or the apprentices:

That hereafter any person who shall employ any laborer or apprentice, who is already under contract for service for any period of time to any other person, and before such time of service shall have elapsed, so as to deprive such first employer of the services of such laborer or apprentice, shall be deemed and held guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine of not less than ten nor more than five hundred dollars, &c.

* * * * * * *

That any person who shall discharge from his employment any laborer or apprentice, during the term of service agreed upon between such employer and such laborer or apprentice, or at the expiration of such term of service, shall, upon the request of said laborer or apprentice, give to him or her a written certificate of such discharge, and upon refusal to do so, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, &c.

Mr. President, if these acts were so wrong and if they were passed by a Legislature lately engaged in red-handed rebellion, by whom, let me ask, were they approved, and why should I and the members of that Legislature who voted for the enactment of these laws be condemned as sinners while the governor who signed and approved them, and in accordance with whose recommendation they were passed, shall be exalted and placed in a niche and catalogued as a saint? I find that these acts were approved by J. Madison Wells, governor of the State of Louisiana—J. Madison Wells, a Union man all through the war; J. Madison Wells, a republican; J. Madison Wells, a friend of the colored man; J. Madison Wells, an obscure individual in those days, but who has grown to greater notoriety in these when he has become the President-maker of this country, the president of the returning board that made Mr. Hayes President and gave the republican party control of this Government not only for the past four years, but at the present time; and these laws had no more earnest advocate in that Legislature than the vice-president of that same returning board, Hon. Thomas C. Anderson, who at that time was a senator and a leader in the Legislature.

I do not know where these laws were found or from what code they were derived. I only know what I was told by their author at the time. He said—and the Senator from Massachusetts can inform me whether it is so or not—that they were copies almost verbatim et literatim of the Massachusetts statutes in force at that period regulating vagrancy and the employment of laborers and apprentices. It was said that similar statutes existed on every statute-book in the Northern and Western States; and it is only by an unfair criticism made after the lapse of fifteen years, or if made at that time made by those who attempted to inaugurate a war between the races, that these laws can be construed into laws intended to fasten slavery on the colored people.

So much for this, Mr. President. The honorable Senator also, in the course of his remarks, dug up the dead bones of some almost forgotten incidents in the history of reconstruction in Louisiana, and if it pleases him in his hyena-like instincts to gnaw these mouldy bones, if he can find any gristle or marrow in them, I am satisfied that he shall do so so long as his term in the Senate shall last. I have heard them alluded to frequently. They have been replied to and refuted and answered and explained over and over again, and I certainly do not intend either now or at any future period to consume any more of the time of the Senate in discussing those things.

The other day, Mr. President, in his concluding speech, my colleague [Mr. KELLOGG] took occasion to criticise my statement of the Louisiana State debt. I said then that at the end of the war the debt of Louisiana was under $5,000,000. I find by accurate figures that it did not reach $4,200,000. At the session of the Legislature to which I alluded, the Legislature of 1866-'67, an act was passed authorizing the issue of bonds for levee purposes. And here I may say en passant that the statement of the gentleman that that Legislature incurred liabilities to the extent of $16,000,000 above the revenue of the State is so absurd that it would dignify it by pronouncing it to be untrue. Those bonds which were issued for levee purposes constituted the whole debt created by that Legislature, and only a portion of those bonds, and a limited portion, were used by the then existing State government. Before the bonds were issued and put upon the market Governor Wells had been removed by military order, and the larger portion of those bonds remained unused and unnegotiated until Governor Warmoth's administration was inauguarated in 1868, and were negotiated by that administration and applied to its purposes, and formed literally and really a part of the debt of reconstruction.

I find that the bonded debt of the State of Louisiana in 1868 was a little upward of eight million dollars. That included the debt before the war—upward of four million dollars; it included so much of those bonds authorized for levee purposes as had been issued, and it included whatever indebtedness was created during the interregnum between the removal of Wells and the installment of the new government in 1868, during which time we had at least two military rulers, who performed all the functions and exercised all the powers of governors of the State, and used what funds they found in the treasury, what funds were derived from taxation, and of course negotiated such bonds as were considered necessary for their purposes.

In 1870, only two brief years afterward, I find that the bonded debt of the State was $17,721,000; that it was increased nearly ten million dollars in two years of radical rule under the first governor elected under reconstruction, and I find that it shortly reached under the same governor the amount of $25,000,000, the limit fixed by the then constitution; and it was this debt which the succeeding administration of my colleague undertook to settle and to reduce by the funding act passed in 1874—a debt of $8,000,000 at the outset when the democratic party went out of power, when, I say further, the people of Louisiana went out of power, and a debt of $25,000,000 in four brief years afterward. And where was that money expended? What evidence is there in Louisiana that the people were benefited by the expenditure of a single dollar of it? What work of public improvement was executed? What railroad was built? Where is there throughout the length and breadth of that State evidence that a dollar of it was appropriated to other purposes than to maintain the vast pomp and power and expense of the government then existing?

I am willing to admit that the debt was but slightly exaggerated, not at all probably so far as bonds were concerned, during the administration of my colleague; but there may have been good reasons for that. During the first two years of his administration his title was so disturbed and doubtful, being contested both at home and in both Houses of Congress, that he would have had little or no credit had he chosen or desired to issue new obligations of the State of Louisiana; and the last two years of his administration it happened that, through the instrumentality of the late Vice-President, by the Wheeler compromise, we had a democratic majority in the lower House of the Legislature, who would have sanctioned no such proceeding, and the governor was powerless to issue new obligations of the State, even if he had desired to do so, as to which I express no opinion.

But, Mr. President, he dealt with a bonded debt of $25,000,000; he dealt with a debt which he says was a valid debt of the State of Louisiana for $25,000,000; and he took that debt and by an act passed by his Legislature reduced it 40 per cent., and told the creditors holding that indebtedness that they could have new bonds at 60 per cent. of the face value thereof, or none at all. Forty per cent. he lopped off and 60 per cent. was given to the creditors. Into this caldron went all the bonds, good and bad, into hotchpotch, as lawyers would say, and they came out new consolidated bonds at sixty cents on the dollar of their original face value; and all so-called legal outstanding warrants issued by his administration and the preceding administration went into that same caldron and were also funded into bonds at 60 per cent. on the dollar. Whether they were good or bad; whether they were issued in pursuance of law or without; whether they were issued for consideration or without; whether the people of Louisiana derived any benefit from them or not, they went before that funding board and were changed into new bonds at sixty cents on the dollar and 7 per cent. interest. If these were all good bonds and a valid indebtedness, I say no greater act of repudiation was ever committed than this, and even if accepted by the creditor, it was accepted, as he said the other day, on the principle of "stand and deliver;" but if they were not good and valid bonds, and the people of Louisiana challenge the assertion, then an immense amount of illegal and fraudulent indebtedness was so changed and converted that the people of Louisiana were not able to sift the good from the bad, to ascertain for what they were really liable, or to inquire if this indebtedness really existed. In this dilemma by their constitutional convention they adopted an ordinance in which, finding it impossible to investigate this debt, they shouldered it all. Finding at the same time that the people were unable to pay taxes to a sufficient amount to pay 7 per cent. interest on this debt, they were compelled to scale the interest, and ask the creditors holding these bonds under the sanction of the constitutional amendment to do what the Senator asked them to do with the principal, only we asked them to reduce the interest to an amount scarcely less than bonds are being negotiated at now day by day, while he, under the same circumstances, with the same compulsion, asked them to knock off 40 per cent. of the principal. I say, Mr. President, that the people of Louisiana have assumed burdens equal and sufficient to that which is carried by any people in this country. There is no State North or West which can be brought into comparison. If they are ground down by a burdensome debt, and if they feel the obligation resting upon them to pay it, which obligation I admit, it is because they have received consideration for those debts, or those debts were contracted by governments chosen by their own people, and they were contracted for public works; the benefits of this indebtedness are all around them, and it would ill become them to quarrel with the payment of that for which they honestly contracted and for which they have received full and valuable consideration.

There is no such case in Louisiana. The money for which these bonds were issued was squandered away. The people never derived any benefit from their sale. They grew poorer and poorer day by day, but the taxes were ground from them to pay the interest on these bonds. They never felt any moral obligation, because they did not empower their agents to issue these bonds. They never felt them to be a legal obligation, because they received no consideration for their issue. Therefore the people of Louisiana cannot be charged with repudiation, but, on the contrary, have done more than any people in this country in the way of shouldering a burdensome debt which they had little or nothing to do with creating.

The honorable Senator alluded the other day also to the election of 1878 and to my election as Senator. In the election of 1878 the republican party had no organization in the State of Louisiana. They had no ticket in the field in that election that he complains of as having been fraudulent and carried by force and violence. The republicans had no ticket. There was a national State ticket; there was a democratic State ticket, and in some few parishes the republicans ran a parish ticket, and ran candidates for the Legislature. In the city of New Orleans, where we both live, they ran none. They had no candidates for Congress; they supported two men calling themselves nationals, running as greenback candidates, who, with the exception of their greenback principles, were democrats then and are democrats now. They supported a candidate for State treasurer who called himself a national greenback candidate. The republicans had no candidate for State office, and they elected but few members of the legislature. In the Legislature which elected me I received 99 votes, including the vote of my opponent, and he received 29 votes, making it 99 to 29. There were two vacancies, one caused by the death of a democrat and one by the absence of a democrat; so that really the Legislature stood 101 democrats to 29 republicans. Deducting all the doubtful men and doubtful parishes which he speaks about, the democratic majority would still have been nearly three to one.

My colleague says that in the parish of Caddo I was voted for by three democratic representatives who were never elected. This is on a par with many of his other statements. The parish of Caddo had a republican senator, who voted against me, and was only entitled to two representatives, who of course voted for me. But the election that he speaks of in the parish of Caddo was investigated by a grand jury. It was investigated by a petit jury of the city of New Orleans before a tribunal of the Government's own seeking, the United States court. The election commissioners were brought on for trial; they were, I will not say prosecuted, but persecuted, to the extreme extent of the law, and were acquitted by the jury, who found them not guilty. On that jury there was not a single democrat. So much for that, Mr. President.

Now I wish to speak in relation to another matter introduced by my colleague in his speech the other day and repeated on the floor to-day by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, the charge that the lottery company caused the downfall of the Packard government and that the lottery company was rewarded for those glorious services by being made perpetual under the constitution framed by the convention and submitted to the people. Before going into the question of what the lottery company did or did not do I want to state for the information of my colleague and the Senator from Massachusetts that the statement that that constitution made the lottery company perpetual is altogether untrue. A simple examination of the constitution, which laid open before my colleague and from which he read, would have shown him that fact.

The Louisiana Lottery Company is one of the funguses which grew out of the carpet-bag government of 1868. It was chartered by the first republican Legislature of 1868. It was granted complete and absolute monopoly, and it was granted a term of thirty years. All that the constitutional convention did was to propose that this company might have a contract, as she had asserted in the courts with judgment in her favor. All that the constitutional convention did was to recognize the existing right of the Louisiana Lottery Company to draw lotteries until 1895, and it absolutely prohibited it or any other lottery company from any existence in Louisiana thereafter, and any Legislature from chartering or incorporating such a company. At the same time it did away with the exclusive privilege of the lottery company during that period. I read from the constitution of Louisiana:

> The General Assembly shall have authority to grant lottery charters or privileges: Provided, Each charter or privilege shall pay not less than $40,000 per annum in money into the treasury of the State: And provided further, That all charters shall cease and expire on the 1st of January, 1895, from which time all lotteries are prohibited in the State.
> The $40,000 per annum now provided by law to be paid by the Louisiana State Lottery Company, according to the provisions of its charter, granted in the year 1868, shall belong to the Charity Hospital of New Orleans, and the charter of said company is recognized as a contract binding on the State for the period therein specified, except its monopoly clause, which is hereby abrogated, and all laws contrary to the provisions of this article are hereby declared null and void: Provided, Said company shall file a written renunciation of all its monopoly features in the office of the secretary of State within sixty days after the ratification of this constitution.

The charge that this company had anything to do by the use of its political influence with the downfall of the Packard government or the maintenance of the Nicholls government is so absurd as not to deserve consideration here. It is founded on the idle talk of a member of the constitutional convention appealing for the passage of this ordinance. The lottery company, chartered as it was under radical rule, possessing as it did probably a large number of republicans among its stockholders and perhaps a republican representation among its directors, was not apt to have taken such a position even if it had had such power. But the lottery company did no more, if it did as much, than probably many other bankers and corporations, and wealthy men in the city of New Orleans, who sympathized with the Nicholls government and who advanced and loaned their money to maintain that government until it should be able to maintain itself. That government maintained itself because it represented the people of Louisiana, because it represented the tax-payers of Louisiana, because it represented the majority of the voters of Louisiana, because it represented its merchants, its planters, its bankers, its landholders, its mechanics, its professional men, its men of education, its men of property, and a large proportion of its labor, both black and white.

In conclusion, the honorable gentleman the other day having eulogized the condition of Louisiana under his beneficent administration, I wish to read but a few words from a report made to Congress describing the working of that government as found by a congressional committee. The report I read from is the report of the Hoar committee made by its chairman, Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, to the Forty-third Congress. The report says:

> The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislature in abolishing existing courts and judges and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the suspension of the elections; by continuing the returning board with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans into an armed brigade of State militia, subject to the command of the governor——

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Louisiana state to the Senate that that is contained in my report?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir; I state this——

Mr. HOAR. I think he has read far enough for me to be warranted in absolutely denying it.

Mr. JONAS. I state what I said before, that it is in the report of the Hoar committee, submitted to Congress by Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, its chairman.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement in one sentence?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. The minority of the committee sent down to Louisiana in the first instance submitted a report drawn up by Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, an eminent democrat. When that minority returned, I, as chairman of the committee, submitted the report to the House as the report of those gentlemen.

Mr. JONAS. That is what I said you did.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. Subsequently I submitted my own views and those of Mr. Wheeler and Mr. FRYE in a separate report. Does the Senator from Louisiana think it quite honest to leave what he has said as a statement of the fact, and when he knows those circumstances; that he should say to the Senate, "This is a report submitted by Mr. HOAR to the House," and stop there? That would tend to make anybody who did not know the fact except from his statement believe it was my report. The Senator from Louisiana knew perfectly well that it was not.

Mr. JONAS. I am not disposed to accept any lesson as to honesty from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I did not undertake——

Mr. JONAS. If he had bided his time in patience I should have given to the Senate the whole history. What I said is true, that it was the report of the Hoar committee. What I said is true, that it was submitted to the House under the signature of Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR. Would it be necessary for me to say to Senators on either side of the Chamber that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts never coincided with the conclusions of this report? Does a Senator here imagine that he has the magnanimity to be generous, much less to do justice, to the people of a Southern State? It needed no explanation from me, but I intended to make it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator chooses to leave it there, I have no objection.

Mr. JONAS. The report from which I was reading continues:

By the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, waterworks, and ferries, cleaning vaults, removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with election judges and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks issued during the years 1870 to 1872; by laws declaring that no person in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State, or allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have seemed to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

This report, submitted as I stated, is signed by the names of Charles Foster, now governor of Ohio, William Walter Phelps, Clarkson N. Potter, and Samuel S. Marshall of Illinois, two republicans and two democrats. A minority report was made and signed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, by Mr. FRYE, now a Senator on this floor, and by the late Vice-President—a minority report which, as I said, so little commended itself to the minority of the committee that Mr. Wheeler lost no time in going to the South to assist himself in destroying the conclusion to which he had arrived in his report.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I did not intend to again occupy the attention of the Senate regarding the question of the debt of the State of Louisiana, nor would I now except that I think it necessary before the occasion passes away to again, as I did a day or two since, set aright the statements of my colleague, not only in regard to the debt of Louisiana but in relation to other matters.

The Senate, as did you yourself, sir, heard my colleague day before yesterday contradict a statement made by me regarding the amount of the debt of Louisiana when the war broke out, that is to say, in 1861. This morning my colleague comes into the Senate and, referring to the statement I then made, says again that he finds after investigation that the debt of Louisiana, in 1861, was less than $5,000,000.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator excuse me?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. JONAS. I stated in my speech the other day what I have said to-day, (I stated it from memory then,) that the debt was something less than $5,000,000 at that time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that is what I said.

Mr. JONAS. You said that I stated that it was scarcely anything, not $5,000,000. I stated the other day that it was near $5,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. The RECORD will show. My remarks then made and the colloquy that occurred between myself and my colleague are published. I am now addressing myself to what my colleague has said to-day. The other day my colleague said that the ante-bellum debt was very small. Subsequently, in some remarks that I had occasion to make in reply to him, I said, referring to his remarks, that he had said the debt was small, and then I proceeded to state that it amounted in 1861 to something like ten million dollars. My colleague then replied that it was about five million dollars. I met that with a counter-statement that it was $10,000,000. To-day after investigation, as he says himself, one day having elapsed, he comes into the Senate and deliberately tells the Senate that his statement made day before yesterday was correct.

Mr. President, a matter of public debt is a matter of record not easily to be disputed; and it requires a remarkable amount of assurance, it seems to me, for any man after deliberation to come into the Senate and speak in regard to a controverted question of that kind without bringing forward some documentary evidence to substantiate what he may say. Some men are best answered by silence and by withholding the words that leap impulsively to the lips; but I cannot afford to let this and other statements of my colleague go unchallenged; therefore to-day once again I place upon record my statement in regard to the condition of the public debt of Louisiana.

In 1872, as is well known, I ran for governor in Louisiana. Colonel McEnery ran against me. James Graham, an old citizen of Louisiana, well known throughout the State, ran upon the McEnery ticket as the candidate of the democratic party for State auditor. He had previously been auditor, and was well and intimately acquainted with the financial condition of the State. On the 1st day of June, 1871, he made a report in regard to the public debt of Louisiana. I read from his statement, being the conclusion of several pages of a report setting forth in extenso the items of the public debt and the dates of the acts of the Legislature under which the bonds or certificates of indebtedness or warrants representing the debt were issued:

Public debt of the State of Louisiana on December 31, 1861, $10,157,882.12.

I call the attention of my colleague to my statement here of day before yesterday, which appears in the RECORD of yesterday.

Public debt of the State of Louisiana on the inauguration of the State administration of 1868, $14,347,051.02.

Again I call the attention of my colleague to my statement in yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. JONAS. How much of that debt was a bonded debt?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is set forth——

Mr. JONAS. It is about eight million dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. If my colleague will send me a statement that I furnished him a short time ago for his information, I can state it.

Mr. JONAS. The Reporter has it for the moment. I read the amount; it is something over $8,000,000. We are talking of the bonded debt, not of the fugitive and floating debt.

Mr. KELLOGG. Why, Mr. President, my colleague said a short time since that the entire debt was less than five millions. I see the ex-Secretary of the Treasury before me. I wonder what would he think if I were to state what the public debt of the United States was and confine my statement to one class of interest-bearing bonds and exclude entirely certificates of indebtedness and valid warrants or other evidence of indebtedness authorized by acts of Congress.

But I continue to read from the report of the auditor:

Public debt of the State of Louisiana on inauguration of present administration, 1868, $14,347,051.02.

Public debt of the State of Louisiana on November 30, 1870, $23,427,952.29.

Now, mark! here follows the certificate of the auditor:

I hereby certify that I have examined and compared the foregoing statements of the debts and liabilities of the State for the years 1861, 1868, and 1870, to June 1, 1871, and found them correct in every particular.

JAMES GRAHAM, Auditor.

Now, sir, unless my colleague rises to his feet and denounces this statement as a fabrication, as not authentic—a statement made by a State auditor, a man who was subsequently a candidate upon the democratic ticket of 1872 for the same position—I am compelled to say that no member of this Senate can place any reliance upon what he may say, howsoever emphatic his assertion may be regarding the public debt of Louisiana.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, certainly.

Mr. JONAS. I desire to say that I place no more reliance upon the statement of Mr. James Graham, then auditor of the State, than I do upon any document or statement emanating from the then government of the State. Mr. James Graham was auditor of the Warmoth government. Mr. James Graham was not a candidate on a democratic ticket. He was a candidate on a fusion ticket, so called, in which I took very little stock. I did not vote for Mr. James Graham, and I do not recognize his statements here any more than I recognize any other executive or legislative reports of that time. I say the figures show, the very statement my colleague holds in his hand shows, that the bonded debt, a legitimate debt of the State of Louisiana (she owed no other) in 1861, was under $5,000,000, and that in order to make the amount of $10,000,000 he includes the contingent liability of the State for the property banks, which has never been included as a part of the debt of the State, and which will never have to be paid by the State, because the banks are able to pay it, and which has never been included in any plan of funding or of settlement of the State debt.

Mr. KELLOGG. I can only say that my colleague is entirely mistaken in all his statements. I assert that the State debt was acknowledged on all sides to be as Graham certified it. A few moments since I sent to the Library for Gayarre's History of Louisiana up to and including the year 1861. I need only say that Gayarre is one of the most accomplished as he is one of the most respectable gentlemen in Louisiana. His reputation for learning and research is great, and he stands unimpeached and unimpeachable. He states that the debt of Louisiana when the war broke out was about ten million dollars. All contemporaneous history bearing upon this matter corroborates this statement, and I have never heard it denied until I heard it denied by my colleague on this floor.

A tabulated statement of that debt was made by a committee that I appointed after I became governor, a committee consisting, with two or three exceptions, of democrats, representing the largest business interests of New Orleans. At their head was John Phelps, then president of the cotton exchange, a conspicuous democrat. This committee over their joint signatures certified to the correctness of this statement. Will my colleague say that John Phelps and Moses Greenwood (who was also on that committee) are not reputable men, as he has said in regard to Mr. Graham? Why did his party place Mr. Graham as their candidate upon the democratic ticket of 1872? Why, in all the addresses sent broadcast throughout the State, did they say, "Here is a man who has been faithful to his trust in every position?" It was conceded that Graham was the very best man in point of ability, reputation, and standing upon the entire democratic ticket. Does my colleague now say that he would not regard as authentic or trustworthy any statement made by him in regard to the public debt?

Mr. JONAS. I did not go so far as that.

Mr. KELLOGG. This will be news in Louisiana, startling news, indeed. But, sir, I do not think it necessary to follow my colleague in all his statements in review of what I said the other day. He did, however, if I recollect aright, say that I had stated that three representatives voted for him who were elected from Caddo Parish. I then proceeded to show that the three members alluded to were improperly elected in that parish. I did then state that "there were three members and one senator from Caddo." I knew, of course, that one senator held over. He was a republican, a black man. Later I said:

The three democratic members from Caddo Parish, who in the Legislature that elected my colleague voted for him, were chosen from a parish having about 4,000 colored voters and about 1,600 white.

Mr. JONAS. Will my colleague permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONAS. How is it you did not know that the parish of Caddo had only two representatives and that only two voted for me?

Mr. KELLOGG. The parish of Caddo had three representatives when I was governor.

Mr. JONAS. It had only two. The action of the Legislature of 1878 fixed it at two.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am about to state to my colleague, if he will be patient, that at the time I was governor, and until the Nicholls government passed a new apportionment act in 1878, there were three members from the parish of Caddo, and my statement was that the democratic members from Caddo Parish were in the Legislature that elected my colleague and voted for him; that they were chosen from a parish having about four thousand colored and about sixteen hundred white votes. Supposing that the same apportionment existed, I stated that there were three members who voted for him when I should have stated that there were two. My colleague was present and could easily have then corrected me. The point I made was that the members of the Legislature chosen from Caddo Parish, returned as democratic, who voted for my colleague, were returned in contravention of law and in violation of the statute of the State from a parish that numbered 4,000 black voters against 1,600 white voters; a parish that was and is republican; a parish that in 1876, even, gave a large majority for Hayes, undisputed and upon the face of the returns, returning a senator then and three members of the lower house. The gist of my argument was that these members who voted for my colleague represented a parish that was republican, and I went on then to show that in order to control the votes absolutely and take them out from under the supervision of the United States officers, although the law of the State specifically provided that there should be but one ballot-box at each poll, the authorities put two boxes at each poll, and compelled the voters who voted for State officers and members of the Legislature to deposit their ballots in one box and those who voted for Federal officers to put their ballots in another box.

The Senate will understand, and I think the country will understand, that what I was aiming to show was the manner in which my colleague was elected. The only answer he now makes is that as a matter of fact there were two members of the lower house elected from Caddo Parish, when I asserted, supposing the representation was the same as in previous years or having in my mind the old apportionment, that there were three. Upon that he gravely rises in the Senate of the United States and says that all the statements I have made ought to be challenged, forgetting, as he always does—forgetting, as the party he represents always does—the great, stalking, majestic fact behind that the right of suffrage has been trampled under foot; that the right of 4,000 freemen to vote were denied in Caddo Parish and two members were sent to represent a minority of the voters of that parish whose commissions were written in fraud and in blood. The facts of that election were disclosed by the investigation headed by the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I would he were in his seat to-day that he might, as I know he desires, testify to the facts that investigation disclosed and state to the Senate the number of men who were murdered in that parish and at the election of the Legislature in 1878 which chose my colleague, the men who were whipped and driven into the swamps, the ballot-boxes that were rifled, the returns or results that were changed by the local returning boards, by the officers at the polls who were all appointed by the governor or by his appointees, men who counted the votes, and reached a result that to every fair-minded man was known to be an outrage upon all fairness and in disregard of all law. Now, if I have made my colleague understand the point I was making the other day upon Caddo, I pass from that to something else.

Mr. JONAS. I ask permission to interrupt my colleague.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. JONAS. I only want to state that so far as the parish of Caddo is concerned, I believe the election of 1876 was the single, solitary time when the republicans carried that parish. Caddo Parish gave a democratic majority in 1868; it gave a democratic majority in 1874; it gave a democratic majority in 1878; it gave a democratic majority in 1880, and was represented by democrats elected at all these elections. Eighteen hundred and seventy-six was the solitary exception, when it gave a republican majority.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in 1868—I have not the record before me, but I am confident that the republicans carried that parish; they certainly did in 1870 in the election of members of the Legislature; and in 1872 it is well known that the supervisors, appointed by the then governor at the behest of the democratic campaign committee, counted me out; that is to say, false returns were made. We showed that fully afterward. In 1874, when the same thing was repeated, I made the proof so positive that Clarkson N. Potter, William Walter Phelps, and S. S. Marshall, a congressional committee, two of whom were democrats, made a statement over their signatures that the republicans were entitled to the three members of the lower house and one senator from Caddo, and they were admitted to the Legislature and served their entire terms. Caddo Parish contains the second city in the State, the city of Shreveport.

And now, sir, let me in passing place this upon your records. I am credibly informed, and I now charge, that the ways and methods of the democratic party of Caddo have wiped out in the last eighteen months every vestige of a school in that parish. We left $10,000 when the Packard government was overthrown and when I went out of office to the credit of the school fund, and every dollar was frittered away. We left twenty-odd schools. They are gone. During the war the awful ravages made by the chariot of Mars in Louisiana where the war raged fiercest left no greater or more complete devastation than the democracy of Caddo have left in regard to the school system in that parish during the last year and a half.

Now, let my colleague rise and defend the administration of the democracy of Louisiana, and especially of Caddo Parish, in reference to the great and much-vaunted system of public schools in the South, about which I heard so much yesterday from the Senator from Georgia that I felt like rising to my feet and giving him this item except that I thought the Senator from Georgia liked me so little that he would not have hailed my interruption with satisfaction. I might say the same of other parishes in the State; but I will content myself with this as an illustration of the enlightenment, the civilization, and the great desire, so often expressed, that the freedmen should be educated, in order that they may become good citizens, that they may properly wield the inestimable gift of free suffrage. I was told by a judge of the district court, now in this city, last night that one of the police jury of that parish had told him that they did not intend to collect the school tax; that they did not believe in educating the freedmen anyway.

Having now, as I hope, in some measure at least, re-established the correctness of some of the statements which were called in question by my colleague, I will proceed to reply to some two or three other statements made by him controverting remarks of mine made the other day in regard to the public debt of Louisiana. I speak of course only from recollection. If I heard my colleague aright, he stated that on examination he had found my statement that there were over sixteen millions appropriated by the democratic Legislatures of 1865, 1866, and 1867 so utterly preposterous that it was not worthy of contradiction. I suppose the point he made that I had misstated the number of members of Caddo he thought was quite sufficient to set at rest this statement in regard to this great appropriation if he but denied it. Sir, I hold in my hand a statement containing the appropriations made in detail during all these years. This statement was taken from the records of the auditor of the State:

List of appropriations made at the extra session of December, 1865.

Legislative expenses	$100,000
Levee bonds	1,000,000

There are other items which I will not read, but the sum total is $1,177,546.17.

Special appropriations made by the Legislature in 1866, giving the number of the acts where made.

Legislative expenses	$75,000
Governor authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness	2,010,000
Governor to issue bonds for warrants of treasury	1,505,000

I will not vex the ears of the Senate by reading the other items of appropriation which are set forth specifically, but the grand total was $5,300,399.75.

Special appropriations made in 1867, giving the number of the act where found.

These cover an entire page of items of appropriations referring to thirty or forty acts and the number of each act, amounting to $10,651,608.90.

Recapitulation.

Amount of appropriations in 1865	$1,177,546 17
Amount of appropriations in 1866	5,300,399 75
Amount of appropriations in 1867	10,651,608 90
Total	17,129,554 82

Making a million in excess of that which I stated the other day.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to go on in detail much further in regard to the statements made by my colleague. There is one important matter, however, one that I wish to be more specific in regard to and relating to the debt of Louisiana. I went over this ground the other day with some particularity; and although what I have to say may be substantially a repetition of much that I then said, in view of what my colleague has said to-day I feel justified in again referring to it. The debt of Louisiana when I became governor amounted in round numbers to $24,000,000. We passed a funding bill, authorizing the funding of that debt at sixty cents on the dollar, and contemporaneously with that act we submitted certain constitutional amendments which were adopted by the people of the State, making the debt created by these bonds a binding, valid, and constitutional debt, "which the State could in no wise impair." We proceeded to submit that adjustment to the bondholders or creditors of the State, and they accepted the provisions of the funding act to such an extent that when I went out of office some $11,000,000 of the new funded bonds had been issued, representing dollar for dollar the old debt that I found when I went into office and 40 per cent. besides.

In the mean time I had carried the question of the legality of the issue of some $5,000,000 of that $24,000,000 to the supreme court of the State, which court decided that the bonds were issued in contravention of law and that the State was not bound to provide for their payment. This decision was afterward, I believe, concurred in by the United States Supreme Court. Deduct those bonds from the $24,000,000, and the reduction by the funding, and it leaves the debt as it was when I went out of office, about eleven million dollars in round numbers. The Nicholls government funded the residue of outstanding bonds, increasing this debt about a million, thus making the debt as funded, in round numbers, $12,000,000.

The Nicholls government, after the overthrow of the Packard government, agreed by joint resolution of the Legislature that this debt should be regarded as the valid and binding debt of the State. The supreme court of the State, Chief-Justice Manning presiding, composed exclusively of democrats appointed by Mr. Nicholls, passed upon the question as to the legality of those bonds. They also passed upon the question of the constitutionality of the funding bill, which was directly put at issue by the attorney-general of the State. This was done chiefly to satisfy any existing doubts in the minds of creditors at home and abroad as to the validity of that debt. The supreme court unanimously decided that the funding bill of 1874 was valid, that the constitutional amendments were legally adopted by a majority of the people of the State, that the funding act was constitutional, that the constitutional amendments were binding, and that the funded debt represented the legal and binding debt of the State of Louisiana. Whereupon the Legislature, the supreme court, the funding board with the governor at the head of the funding board, and the fiscal agent of the State, published a statement to the world, accompanying it with a certified copy of the decision of the supreme court affirming the validity of the debt, and the act of the Nicholls legislature affirming the validity of the debt and pledging the people of the State to pay it. They published all this in New York, in Amsterdam, in London, and in all the great marts of the world, and they accompanied it with a further statement that the people of the State hereafter would come forward—although heretofore derelict, as they were admitted to have been—and, without distinction of party, pay up the delinquent taxes, and thereafter pay all taxes assessed against them, thus securing the certainty of the payment of the interest on these bonds. Upon that declaration one house or two in this city, if I am correctly informed, and I know it to be the fact that four or five large houses in New York immediately invested largely in Louisiana bonds. They were largely invested in by foreign capitalists, and even trustees, executors, tutors, and tutrixes in the city of New Orleans, and some savings-banks invested in these bonds, relying upon the often-repeated and solemn averments of the Nicholls government, that they represented the valid and binding debt of the State, and would be paid, principal and interest, as they fell due. No bonds were regarded as more certain to be paid among those who had faith in the Nicholls government and in the sincerity of its solemn pledges.

The bonds went up above 90 per cent., and they were slowly creeping up to par when, like a thunder-clap out of a clear sky, came the announcement in the fall of 1877 that there was a deficiency in the interest fund and that the State would not be able on the 1st of January, 1878, to pay the interest on the public debt. They had paid the interest in July, 1877, thus increasing the confidence that capitalists might have in purchasing the bonds, but how did they pay it? They paid it partially out of money I left behind, money that was collected the last half of the last year of my administration. I had paid the interest up to the last day I was in office, paying all but about thirty thousand dollars of over three hundred thousand dollars then due as interest on the funded debt January 1, 1877. They borrowed a portion of the rest from their fiscal agent, as his accounts afterward showed, and they made up the deficiency in order to reach the amount of interest due on July 1, 1877, out of what they did collect under the 5¼ mills tax provided by the funding bill, which was to be set apart forever for the payment of interest accruing on these bonds.

But mark, sir, as the 1st of January, 1878, approached it began to be said all through commercial circles that the taxes were not being paid and that the interest due in January, 1878, would not be paid, and the bonds began of course to go down. I happened to be in the city of New Orleans a few days before the 1st of January, 1878, that is to say, on Christmas, and some of the people most interested in the payment of the bonds, not bondholders, called on my old fiscal agent, Joseph H. Oglesby, president of the Louisiana National Bank, the most responsible bank in New Orleans, backed by Winslow, Lanier & Co., of New York, who were my fiscal agents, a firm known all over the country, a firm who came to the aid of the war governor of Indiana during the war when the democracy of Indiana refused to furnish the money to equip the militia and send them to the front to maintain the Constitution and the integrity of the flag—these men came to the old fiscal agent and asked him to come to the relief of the State. He said, "If you will turn over everything to me, and if you will find bankers enough in the city to sign an obligation for one-half of the necessary amount to pay the interest on the public debt, I will redeem the State from bankruptcy." So poor was the State credit that this could not be done. What was the result? Every commercial man in New Orleans will remember it. The interest was not paid and the State went to protest, and from that day to this Louisiana has stood, in all the marts of the world, placarded as a defaulter and a bankrupt. The Legislature met on the first Monday of January and took into consideration the condition of the public debt. They said something must be done, and so they commenced devising ways and means of getting rid of this debt; and finding no better way, they appropriated what money was collected to the credit of the interest fund for the payment of the coupons that fell due on the 1st of January, 1878, to the payment of the expenses of the State government, including their own pay; and upon the principle, I suppose, that one good—or rather bad—act deserves another, they immediately proceeded to pass a law authorizing the election of delegates to a constitutional convention to frame a new constitution for the State. They were going to get rid of the constitution of 1868, framed by the republicans, anyway. It was a good constitution, but they were determined to get rid of it. It is enough to say that that law passed.

The following summer the constitutional convention elected under this bill met. What did it do? After much wrangling and much discussion and submitting of reports, one of which I hold in my hand, signed by Thomas J. Semmes, who was senator from the State of Louisiana in the confederate congress at Richmond, and other democrats representing large commercial and business interests like himself, these men said to the convention, "Gentlemen, you cannot in honor repudiate that debt. This debt is less than it was when the war closed or when the republicans took charge of the government, and with what consistency can you repudiate a debt that, when the funding is complete, will be $1,500,000 less than the State owed, according to our own admission, when in 1868 the republicans took charge of the government, and for which we have received ninety-nine cents, or nearly par, on the dollar, and put the proceeds into our levees and public works?"

A Mr. Kidd, from Jackson Parish, was chairman of the committee that made the report recommending repudiation; he was in the Legislature when I was governor. He was a man of no considerable property; a good fellow, a man who was "hail fellow, well met," but representing little property and representing a parish whose delinquent tax was nearly 80 per cent. I wish I had the statistics before me; but I believe I am correct in saying that all the assessable property of the whole of his parish would scarcely buy a block of buildings in Washington. Repudiation was the order of the day; and my colleague, who stands with holy horror and protests in this Senate against our taking Riddleberger for Sergeant-at-Arms, represents a party who are in the habit of saying that the State ought not to pay anything; that public credit is a nuisance. They belong to a class of men who in North Louisiana indulge in the great luxury of sitting on the verandahs and smoking clay or cob pipes while they look out upon the dilapidation on every hand, while they enjoy the inestimable satisfaction of cursing Yankees and damning their more thrifty neighbors who with northern capital are making in some portions of the State the desert to blossom like the rose and the waste places to be made glad. Sir, such men may well stand aghast at what they call the readjustment sentiment represented by Riddleberger and his advocates.

But to come back to the constitutional convention. The convention finally concluded to compromise in deference to the tremendous sentiment that was evoked in New Orleans and elsewhere in regard to open repudiation, and agreed to submit to a popular vote the ordinance which I read the other day. I will not now trouble the Senate with it, save one clause, and that clause at the risk of repetition I will again call the attention of the Senate to. Article 3 is:

Be it further ordained, That the coupon of said consolidated bonds falling due the 1st of January, 1880, be, and the same is hereby, remitted, and any interest taxes collected to meet said coupon are hereby transferred to meet the expenses of the State government.

Mr. DAWES. What do they mean by "remitted"—given up?

Mr. KELLOGG. Appropriated, taken away, taken from the treasury of the State, where they were set apart to the credit of the sinking fund under the act of 1874, and which were due to creditors who were clamoring at the treasury door——

Mr. DAWES. But what do they mean by remitting coupons?

Mr. KELLOGG. I confess it is peculiar language.

Mr. DAWES. Then a man who gives a note and repudiates it remits the interest on the note?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir, if he is a democrat. [Laughter.] I mean a Bourbon democrat, for there are a great many democrats who denounced and set their faces against this proceeding from the first, and do to this hour.

Mr. DAWES. The men who made the notes remitted the interest on them!

Mr. KELLOGG. A large proportion of the citizens of New Orleans at the present moment utterly repudiate it. I have stated that a law had been passed hypothecating the interest due before that. They did not pay it. Now comes one law taking the coupons due on the 1st of January, 1880, taking the money due upon those coupons from the hands of the treasurer and remitting or hypothecating it.

My colleague talked about an option the other day; I will show you another option the convention gave to the voters of the State. They submitted the ordinance to a separate vote, and at the same time submitted the new constitution. It was provided that if a majority of votes were cast for the ordinance relative to the State debt, it should be incorporated in the constitution and made a part thereof. The constitution was carried by a majority vote, the ordinance being carried by a majority vote, as they returned it, and of course became a part of the constitution of the State. Now, in order to silence opposition to the debt ordinance, what do you suppose they did? They actually incorporated a clause in the constitution providing—I will not read it, but I will state it—that in case the debt ordinance was adopted the State tax provided to be levied should be sufficient, as they estimated it to cover the interest provided for by the debt ordinance; but in case the voters of the State refused to indorse and ratify the debt ordinance, then and in that case the taxes of the entire State for all purposes should be limited to five mills, which would absolutely exclude any possibility from that time on of the payment of interest even at the rate proposed by the debt ordinance of 2 per cent.

Mr. DAWES. What difference did that make?

Mr. KELLOGG. The difference between the rate of taxation they provided for in the event of the adoption of the ordinance—I think it was six or seven mills; my colleague perhaps will know—and the five mills they limited it to in case the ordinance was not adopted. Thus they said in effect to those who threatened to oppose the debt ordinance, Defeat that ordinance and total repudiation stares you in the face, because such act will limit the State tax provided by the new constitution for all State purposes to such a rate that you cannot possibly procure by the collection of the tax sufficient to pay the interest even at the rate we propose to allow you.

So, then, whatever my friend whom I respect so highly, the Senator from Florida, may say regarding the immaculate record of the democratic party of his State, or the shortcomings and misdoings of the republican party in the matter of repudiation, for which, as the honorable Senator from South Carolina says, the democratic party of that State is not chargeable, whatever others may say in regard to the democratic party in their States upon the question of repudiation, I say that the entire debt of the State of Louisiana when the funding that was admitted to be legally binding and constitutional was completed was a million and a half less than it was when the republican party took charge of the government in 1868, and a million and a half less than the democratic party had received from their creditors at home and abroad in honest money, and put into the levees, or are supposed to have put into levees and other public works of the State. I submit that this was as rascally an act of repudiation as ever disgraced any country under the sun.

Mr. President, we have heard a good deal about the lottery company and about these other companies, corporations, &c., in Louisiana, and how the republican party is responsible for that.

My colleague read from a document signed, he says, by Clarkson N. Potter, chairman of some committee, and by Mr. Phelps, and others. I will not go into that. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] if he thinks there is occasion for it will some time enlighten the Senate as to how that report came to be made. Quoting from that and accompanying it with certain statements, my colleague says the republican party is chargeable for the charter of incorporation of the lottery company, chargeable with the lottery company, because under my predecessor the lottery company, made up of democrats almost exclusively, went into the lobbies of the Louisiana Legislature and procured a charter apparently harmless in its nature, like the Maryland charter and like the Kentucky charter passed by the Bourbon democracy in their palmy days. Under that charter the Louisiana Lottery Company organized, and later, when the Nicholls government came in, they said, "We will proceed immediately to confiscate the rights of the lottery company," and they passed a bill repealing the lottery charter through the house and it was sent to the senate, a small body of only thirty-six members. Mr. Robertson, of Saint Landry, one of the leading lights of the democratic party at the present time—then one of the principal members of the State democratic committee—had charge of the bill. A committee went to the lottery company and said, "Mr. Lottery Company, come down;" and it is an open secret that their committee waited upon the president and officers of the lottery company. The result was that the senate agreed to indefinitely postpone the house bill repealing the lottery charter. This was about the time the commission was coming down appointed by President Hayes.

I read to you a portion of the debates in the constitutional convention the other day, when Mr. Robertson said, "You have got to incorporate this Louisiana lottery charter in the constitution because the lottery company demands it; we agreed to do it, and you know it, because we postponed in the senate on my motion the house bill for the repeal of the lottery company's charter. It is so nominated in the bond that they should be incorporated in the constitution because but for the money they furnished to the Nicholls government in its hour of need the Packard government would be standing to-day." This is in the debates as published in the New Orleans Democrat, the official organ of the democratic administration in the State of Louisiana. My colleague, I presume, does not intend to deny it. I take it with all his denials he does not deny this. He will not, I am quite sure, turn his back upon the credit his party is entitled to in originating the sublime idea of overthrowing the government of a sovereign State and injecting in its place an illegitimate government representing only a minority of the people of that State, and of which my colleague is the legitimate offspring to-day. They incorporated that charter in the constitution, and here my colleague makes much of my stating that it was an irrepealable, perpetual charter; he does not deny that it was incorporated, but he says it was not perpetual. He admits it was irrepealable because it was made part of the constitution, and as one of the officers remarked to me a few weeks since in this city, and he has made the remark often, "We are out of the clutches of those fellows now; they can't touch us." My colleague admits they cannot touch them, because it is irrevocable and irrepealable as a part of the constitution. That was the gist of all my statement in that regard the other day. I admit he is probably correct in saying that when the term prescribed by the original charter during which the monopoly was to run—namely, until about 1900—expires, they will cease to be an institution recognized by the constitution; then their rights may end, but they will run for nearly twenty years, and for nearly twenty years the earnings of the servant men and the servant women of New Orleans will be invested in those bits of paper that are said to contain prizes to be ground through the lottery company, the machine-crank of which is turned by Beauregard and the prizes distributed by Jubal Early.

The repudiation of the public debt is a standing monument of infamy marking one distinctive and prominent act of the democratic administration of Louisiana which should stand, as it does, side by side with its twin sister, this monopoly the lottery company incorporated in the constitution, and these two monuments of democratic rule are a sublime embodiment and personification of the moral tone, enlightenment, and civilization of that party!

Sir, I pass from this dry and uninteresting matter of State finance to another question, namely, the question of the condition of the colored men and the record of the democratic party in regard to them in Louisiana. I would not again refer to this subject had not my colleague consumed a considerable portion of the time he occupied in endeavoring to show that because J. Madison Wells approved certain acts of the Legislature of 1865 and 1866 those acts were not to be condemned; that the simple approval by J. Madison Wells of those vagrant acts was a mantle that should be thrown over all the sins and iniquities that might slumber beneath those acts.

J. Madison Wells was appointed provisional governor directly after the war by President Johnson and previous to the passage of the reconstruction acts by Congress. I speak from recollection only, not having examined the record, as this matter has sprung up suddenly. I think, however, it was about two months after the assassination of President Lincoln. Andrew Johnson subsequently, it will be remembered, in his policy conflicted with Congress, Congress having asserted that the government of Louisiana and other governments of the South should not be left exclusively in the hands of the white people or those who had been identified with the confederate cause, and in contradistinction to that policy Andrew Johnson claimed that those States should be rehabilitated, that they should remain in the hands of and be administered by the white people of those States. Governor Wells was a large planter. He was an old-line whig, sharing at that time the prejudices shared by most of the white people, regardless of party, concerning the colored man and his status. A large delegation of citizens from New Orleans, representing the business interests, and from the country representing the planting interests, came to Washington and importuned the then President, Johnson, to appoint or recognize J. Madison Wells provisional governor of Louisiana.

Mr. JONAS. My colleague will remember that Governor Wells was elected lieutenant-governor under the constitution of 1864, and when Governor Hahn was elected to the Senate Governor Wells became governor, and was recognized as governor under the constitution of 1864 and so acted until he called a new election under that constitution.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague was in the Legislature and he will recollect it; but what I stated I think is correct. I had forgotten that Governor Wells was elected lieutenant-governor. I believe he was; but the question was whether President Johnson in appointing a provisional governor would designate Wells as provisional governor, or appoint, as he did in other States, private citizens.

Governor Wells was recognized as provisional governor by President Johnson. That is the point I am making, and it is made more effective and distinct when I state also, as I was about to do, that afterward, and while Wells was provisional governor, the democratic party of the State took him up and made him their candidate for governor of the State, and he was elected as a democratic governor by the white people of the State.

My colleague endeavored to avoid the force of the statement that the Legislature of 1865 and 1866 was composed almost exclusively of ex-confederates who passed those laws. He says those laws, though passed by the Legislature, were passed under the auspices of J. Madison Wells, and were approved by him. I reply that while J. Madison Wells was governor his lieutenant-governor was Albert Voorhies, who was the embodiment of the Bourbonistic or last-ditch element, in later-day parlance, of the democratic party. He was in the lieutenant-governor's chair, and the Legislature was composed almost exclusively of ex-confederate officers, as I have said. If I mistake not, every member in both houses was an ex-confederate. When Andrew Johnson sent a telegram to Governor Wells, asking him to lay a special message before the Legislature at the time the fourteenth amendment was submitted for their consideration, which message begged and implored them in the interest of his new policy, and to more successfully antagonize the rising element in the two Houses of Congress and all over the North against his scheme of reconstruction, to adopt it, that Legislature marched up in solid phalanx and with scarce a dissenting vote in both houses tabled the fourteenth amendment, and thus refused to ratify it. Directly after they passed the vagrant laws that for atrocity shocked the moral sense of the civilized world. They went to Governor Wells and said, "Sir, approve these vagrant acts or we will suspend you from office under a clause of the constitution which requires only a majority vote of the lower house to suspend you from your functions as governor, and we will put Albert Voorhies, who, standing behind you, represents the last-ditch Bourbon element of this State, and he will make haste to affix his signature." Thus Governor Wells had the alternative of approving or being suspended.

Sir, I recall an incident under my administration as governor which I will digress to relate. Under the Wheeler adjustment that my colleague referred to, the last two years of my administration, the Bourbons had the lower house; as he said, the house was democratic. The Senator from Massachusetts will well recollect all that. One inducement for us to enter into that adjustment was that in order to get possession of one house the democratic members signed a protocol, with three or four exceptions agreeing that they would not seek to impeach me if I would consent to the terms of this adjustment which, as I have said, gave them the lower house. We finally submitted terms of arbitration to Clarkson N. Potter, William Walter Phelps, Mr. HOAR, William A. Wheeler, WILLIAM P. FRYE, and S. S. Marshall, who I think constituted the committee. They unanimously agreed that we should admit certain members in the house, and I may state in passing, since that parish has been called in question to-day, that they gave us the three members from Caddo. So we gave them the house, having ourselves control of the senate.

Now, what did that Legislature do? They ran along according to the terms of their protocol, which distinctly pledged them not to attempt to impeach me. One or two days before the close of their legislative term, which ended in March, 1876, a few months before the election of 1876, they passed an election law through the house and sent it to the senate which repealed all the safeguards to an honest election in the State, wiping out all the power the governor or other constituted officers had, and when the senate refused to pass it, the democratic house met in caucus and sent a committee to me, whose spokesman said, "Sir, I regret to inform you that if you do not cause your senate to pass that election law," which, as I have said, practically put the election machinery of the State into the hands of the democrats, taking it away from the republican State government, "it is our solemn determination to suspend you," under the same or a similar clause of the constitution under which they threatened to suspend Governor Wells if he did not approve those vagrant acts. I said to them that I did not propose to urge the senate to pass any such bill, and I could not pledge myself to approve it if passed. Well, sir, they went back, and in about four hours they had a resolution through the house suspending me. I will not go into that matter further, except to say that the senate acquitted me immediately. The president of the clearing-house of New Orleans, the leading men, the Picayune, the Times, the great commercial organs, all denounced this proceeding to suspend me, and, to make a long story short, it ended at twelve o'clock the second night after. At the close of the constitutional term of the session the gas in the State-house was turned off, and the democrats went home and I remained governor. There was nearly the same condition of things as when Governor Wells was compelled to approve the vagrant acts.

Having thus shown how these vagrant acts came on the statute-book, I desire for a moment to refer to some of their provisions.

According to the vagrant act, as it was called, which perhaps as a matter of infamous legislation exceeded the famous vagrant laws of Mississippi or any other State of the South, it was provided that all agricultural laborers should be compelled to make labor contracts during the first ten days of January for the next year. The contract once made the laborer was not to be allowed to leave his place of employment during the year except on conditions not likely to happen and easily prevented. The master was allowed to make deduction of the servant's wages. That is the language——

Mr. JONAS. I would ask the Senator if he is reading the act?

Mr. KELLOGG. No, sir; but I have the act at hand.

Mr. JONAS. What is he reading?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am reading a statement regarding these acts and summarizing them. I want to be specific as to their provisions. I again repeat that the masters were allowed to make deductions of the servant's wages for "injuries"—I quote now from the act—"done to animals and agricultural implements committed to his care," thus making the negroes responsible for wear and tear. Deductions were to be made for "bad or negligent work," the master being the judge. For every act of "disobedience" a fine of $1 was imposed on the offender; disobedience being a technical term made to include, besides "neglect of duty" and "leaving home without permission," such fearful offenses as "impudence," or "swearing," or "indecent language in the presence of the employer, his family, or agent," or "quarreling or fighting with one another." The master or his agent might assail every ear with profaneness aimed at the negro men and outrage every sentiment of decency in the foul language addressed to the negro women; but if one of the helpless creatures, goaded to resistance and crazed under tyranny, should answer back with impudence, or should relieve his mind with an oath, or retort indecency upon indecency, he did so at the cost to himself of $1 for every outburst. The "agent" referred to in the statute is the well-known overseer of the cotton region, and the care with which the law-makers of Louisiana provided that his delicate ears and sensitive nerves should not be offended with an oath or an indecent word from a negro will be appreciated by all who have heard the crack of the whip on a southern plantation. If their masters or their agents or overseers, if the Bourbon democracy—I speak of that as contradistinguished from the great conservative sentiment of the democratic party in Louisiana, which my colleague does not represent—were subjected to the requirements of that law, and were compelled for every blasphemy, or oath, or impudence, or blackguardism addressed to colored men and to others, to pay a dollar, they could easily pay all the public debts they have repudiated. [Laughter.]

It is impossible to quote all the hideous provisions of those statutes under whose operation the negro would have relapsed, gradually but surely, into actual and admitted slavery. I believe there are in the more remote and inaccessible portions of Louisiana colored men who scarcely now realize that under the ægis of the Constitution and by the terms of the proclamation of emancipation framed by Abraham Lincoln they are freemen in the image of their Maker, God, but who think that the Government of the nation has neglected them, that the government of the State—for that is a palpable, visible fact—has passed away, and that they are remitted again to a kind of servitude much the same as before the war, at least so far as their political freedom is concerned.

Sir, I cannot afford to occupy your time much longer, nor do I think it necessary.

As to the proposition so often reiterated by my colleague, that the colored people occupy a condition of comparative comfort, are satisfied with the order of things, are content under democratic rule, and will aid by their suffrages to continue and perpetuate democratic rule in Louisiana, I enter my earnest protest. I enter it, sir, in view of the fact that before the war they were slaves, and that they were emancipated by the war, and in full view of the fact that one of the first acts performed by the democratic Legislature of Louisiana after the war was to encumber the statute-book with the vagrant acts, portions of which I have read, and which continued on the statute-book until wiped out by a republican Legislature.

I protest against such a statement, because as soon as Congress, under the reconstruction measures, gave the colored people the right of suffrage, during the memorable presidential campaign of 1868, they were shot down like sheep by the hundred in several parishes, shot down because they had been true to the Union and the Constitution, because the ballot, that badge of citizenship, was found in their hands.

I protest against such a proposition in the name of the one hundred and fifty men who were shot down in July, 1866, in the streets of New Orleans, for their political opinions; the three hundred that were shot down in Saint Landry Parish, and over two hundred in Bossier Parish, in 1868, for the same reason; in the name of the one hundred and more who were killed and mutilated at Colfax in 1873; of the murdered white leaders butchered in the infamous Coushatta massacre; of the many slain in order to effectually suppress the republican vote in Ouachita, East Feliciana, Caddo, Tensas, and other parishes, just before the elections of 1876 and 1878; and of vast numbers of others murdered for their opinion's sake, as the pages of history conclusively show.

When I ran for governor in 1872, a well-known, able, and respected white lawyer named Crawford was elected on the same ticket as district judge. He was an independent and was voted for by both parties. Another able lawyer named Harris was elected on the democratic ticket as district attorney. A good many of the colored people and the white republicans voted for him. After the unfortunate difference that occurred between the McEnery government and my own, in an endeavor to put down acts of lawlessness perpetrated upon colored men and upon white republicans, I appealed in an earnest letter addressed to all the judges and district attorneys in the State that they aid me in enforcing the law and suppressing crime. In response to that appeal there were two or three democratic district attorneys in the State that publicly declared their determination to comply with my request. One notably was Harris. Judge Crawford called a special term of court, and, aided by district attorney Harris, proceeded to vigorously enforce the laws. Bills were found by the grand jury against several persons in Caldwell Parish and writs were issued for their arrest, and the court adjourned. As the judge and the district attorney were on their way to their homes from court after these proceedings they were waylaid and both shot dead by masked men. I offered a reward for the apprehension of the murderers. It was impossible for me to secure their arrest or punishment. Some of those believed to be the murderers of Crawford were hunted by his brother, a man of great determination and iron nerve; they fled to Texas, and it is said he has hunted those men for years. That double murder left two widows and nine orphan children to mourn for those whose faces they would never more see, and the sound of whose voices they would never again hear, and it carried terror into the hearts of the thousands of colored voters in all that region of country.

"Ah, but," it will be said, "why did you not enforce the law?" I did not enforce the law because there was an imperium in imperio, a power greater than I that stood behind my government and paralyzed the visible State government and State authority. When the honorable Senator from Georgia said yesterday those outrages ceased wherever the democrats got charge of the government, it was a confession of what every intelligent man in candor must admit, that these crimes were committed for the purpose and to the end that they might overthrow the republican governments and establish the democracy in power.

The honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] will bear me out in one matter that calls itself to my recollection. When the Nicholls government was established and the Packard government overthrown, one of the first acts of the Legislature under the Nicholls regimé was to pass a resolution of amnesty, saying that all republicans, white and black, who had found refuge in the parish of Orleans could go home. Believing in the good faith of this resolution, after some hesitation, some of them went home, notably one D. A. Weber, a supervisor at the election of 1876 for the parish of West Feliciana, a parish containing 300 white voters and about 2,500 or 3,000 colored voters. He was a native of that parish, and in 1872 supported Greeley for President and McEnery for governor. A few days after he arrived at home he became satisfied that his life was not safe, and determined to leave the parish. Knowing the senior Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN,] who had been down there on a committee sent by the Senate to investigate into the matters connected with the election of 1876, he wrote him a letter stating that "notwithstanding he had returned under the declaration of amnesty made by the Nicholls government he felt certain that he was not safe, and (he wrote) "I am going back to New Orleans for safety, leaving my wife and children here, and will take them there as soon as I can; I may be dead before this letter reaches you." On the morning that the mail-carrier in this city delivered that letter to the Senator from Minnesota the Associated Press dispatches in the morning papers announced that the day before this man, Weber, had been shot dead in the streets of Bayou Sara by concealed assassins in the court-house firing from the court-house window, leaving his widow and helpless orphans clothed in the habiliments of mourning. Mr. President, I need only add that in this case as in several others of more recent date no effort was made to arrest and convict the perpetrators of these crimes.

But, sir, I have said enough. Recurring to what I was saying when I digressed to relate these two incidents, I again protest against the proposition that the colored people of Louisiana will cheerfully vote the democratic ticket. I protest because of the record that I have referred to of all these massacres, of all these crimes committed in the name of democracy, and because to-day that name carries terror to the heart of every freedman in Louisiana, who shudders whenever the record of that party is brought to his recollection. To say that these men will cheerfully vote the democratic ticket is to utter a statement that is contradicted in letters of blood written all over the history of Louisiana. It is stating that which thousands of shallow graves upon the banks of the Red River and the Ouachita and in the swamps of Louisiana, wherein repose the bones of the loyal colored and white republican dead, slain for their opinion's sake, will here and for all time refute.

In conclusion I commend to the Bourbon democracy of Louisiana that scriptural injunction which is at once a malediction and a prophecy: "When He maketh inquisition for blood he forgetteth not the cry of the humble." Sir, did I not say to this Senate what I have said, I feel that I would be reproached by the thousands of victims who sleep the sleep of death, who fell slain by the relentless hate, the undying, awful, and deathless hostility of the Bourbon democracy of Louisiana. [Applause.]

Mr. JONAS. I intend to occupy but a moment, and no part of that time in answering the tirade of the Senator from Louisiana.

The Senator in the early part of his remarks said that in the parish of Caddo, in Louisiana, there are now no public schools and no education for the colored people, and he challenged contradiction of his statement. It happens that last spring that matter was investigated by the committee of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] was the chairman, the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the exodus. I find before me testimony on that point which I beg leave to read to the Senator and to the Senate. First, I will read from the testimony of Mr. J. H. Shepherd, who says that he is the superintendent of public schools in Shreveport and of the public schools for the parish of Caddo; and thus testifies:

Q. Is there any discrimination between the whites and the blacks in the schools in Caddo Parish?

A. None at all, sir.

Q. Is the school money used in the same proportion for the one as for the other?

A. Yes, sir; precisely. I wish to state that when I became inspector of the schools I found the public schools confined almost entirely to Shreveport. I will only state what I know to be a matter of fact. I went there in 1874, and began teaching a private white school. I taught in three or four localities in the parish; I became very well acquainted over the entire parish of Caddo. I taught for a while on the border of the State, on the line of Arkansas. During the years 1874, 1875, and 1876 I took occasion to go over the parish considerably. I knew of but one public colored school in the parish in 1874. After I was subpœnaed to come here, in order to refresh my memory in regard to the public-school system in Caddo County, I had a memorandum made out from the records of the old school board, from that preceding the one now in existence. I notice that no schools were kept in the country parts of Caddo Parish, for either white or black, for more than three months in the year. The salaries paid teachers were very high; they were paying salaries the of $80 a month to teachers. When I took charge of the schools I adopted the same system of examination which prevails in the State of New York. On the records I notice among the names of the teachers that of one McClelland, who was examined by me. I held an annual examination at the commencement of each year. I devoted one day to the examination of colored teachers, and one day to whites. In 1877 I found that the colored teachers were not up to the standard of the whites; and the questions I put to those teachers were of a nature more easily answered than those I put to the whites. I do not think that any of them scarcely could pass the examination, easy as it was. Among the applicants was this man McClelland, who had been receiving $80 a month for teaching school at Morningsport. On examination I found that he could not set down a sum in simple subtraction. There were others who could not write a correct sentence in grammar, nor, in fact, hardly read at all. I changed all this as fast as I could. During 1877–'78 I secured some excellent teachers. I have one of them now, a young miss who came from Oberlin, Ohio, who passed as good an examination as any white teacher I had there. I have placed her in charge of one of our schools. Another was raised there in Shreveport; she was the daughter of a black man named Hickman; I think her father sent her to New Orleans; I am not positive about that. Throughout the country the standard was raised. I had some excellent teachers this year, but, owing to the failure of funds, I was compelled to close the schools. I think we closed the schools about the 1st of March, after five months' session. I have heard considerable here in regard to the failure of the schools. There has been no failure of the schools since the administration of the present board of directors. When the school funds were turned over to us, we found in the treasury about fourteen thousand dollars. We found that the treasurer, Mr. Antoine, who is the present lieutenant-governor, had deposited some of it in the Freedman's Bank; and it went where the other funds deposited in that bank did—if anybody knows where that is. We have not been able to recover all of it, though the attorney has threatened suit; some portion of it has been returned. So far as discrimination is concerned, I have never made any, nor seen any made, at all. I have given the people of that parish better teachers than they ever had before; and have improved the standard of education, under great difficulties. At first my efforts in this direction were received with disapprobation, but now all express themselves very well satisfied. They did not at first like my bringing in teachers from abroad, which it was necessary to do in order to have good ones.

I also find on page 180 of the same document the testimony of L. E. Dodez, who says that he is a northern man by birth, a republican, a citizen of Ohio, near Wooster, Wayne County, living temporarily in Shreveport:

Q. You spoke of being connected with the sale of the Singer sewing-machine as agent; have you traveled much over the country and talked with colored people or in any way ascertained their school advantages?

A. School advantages? Oh, yes; as far as school is concerned we find schools throughout the country; there are, that is—I speak for our State; we are only eighteen miles from the Texas line, and I have traveled a good deal in the bordering counties of Texas. In our State we have schools there for white and blacks, separate, and they enjoy school advantages the same as we do.

Q. How have they fared in school privileges under Mr. Sheppard here, who, I believe, succeeded, I forget now who?

A. Well, sir, as far as I know, they have fared the same as we did. Their school closed at the same time the white school closed; they closed before we left there. And as far as competency of teachers, I know some of the teachers there who are employed, and as a general thing there is a very good class of colored teachers.

On page 79 Mr. Currie, the mayor of Shreveport, testified as follows:

Q. How about the schools down there? Are there any schools for the colored people?

A. In the city of Shreveport there are three colored schools and three public schools, every one of them public schools. But the means for keeping up the schools are very limited. Up to 1876 the State was in the hands of the republicans; and if there are any complaints to be made in reference to school matters they must fall upon them rather than upon the democrats, for the reason that the annual expenses amounted to a little over four millions of dollars, and the appropriation for the school fund was stolen, the most of it. There was hardly a treasurer in the State that was not charged with being in default.

This evidence shows that in the parish of Caddo there is not only a good public-school system, but there is the same number of schools for colored people that there is for the whites, and the same facilities are afforded for the education of colored children as of the white children of that parish.

I have but a word more to say, and that in correction of manifest errors, not of the arguments or deductions of fact made by my colleague. The acts to which he refers and to which I referred were approved by Governor Wells in 1865, before all those circumstances which he has detailed which he says influenced Governor Wells, before there was any disagreement between the Legislature and Governor Wells, but, on the contrary, while Governor Wells was in full accord with the Louisiana Legislature. Those acts, to my certain knowledge, met his personal approbation. Not only was there no effort made to compel him to sign the acts, but there was the most perfect harmony prevailing between him and the Legislature, and that harmony continued to exist for certainly over a year.

I do not care to enter into a discussion of one of the alleged assassinations of which my colleague has spoken. I wish simply to correct some of his facts. He has mentioned the case of the judge and district attorney in a certain district. This judge he called Caldwell. His name was Crawford. The first error the Senator made was in describing the limits and character of the judicial district over which Judge Crawford presided. It did not include the parish of Tensas, the parish of Concordia, nor the large republican parishes. It was a district composed of the parishes of Caldwell, Catahoula, Richland, and Franklin, a democratic district, in which Judge Crawford had been largely defeated before the people, a fact that he admitted until he was returned by the returning board and commissioned. The district attorney was a prominent democratic politician. Judge Crawford and the district attorney were traveling together in the same buggy to hold court, and although it was a violent act of assassination, which not only was never approved by any one but met with the disapproval of the whole section in which both those officers were deservedly popular, it was never ascribed to political causes, nor was it the result of any political prosecution instituted before either of these officers or in the courts over which one presided and and in which the other was the district attorney.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall now have a vote on the resolution and proceed with the regular business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] to postpone indefinitely the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he would not as soon take the test vote upon the passage of the resolution?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not want to occupy so much time on the resolution. I propose to go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know but that the Senator would be willing to save time by taking a test vote on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Have I the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. BROWN. The judge of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States was recently promoted to the position of judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, which left a vacancy in the position of judge of that circuit. That vacancy has not been filled yet. There was a nomination made, as you doubtless recollect, by the President before the end of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. DAWES. When you had the power to confirm him.

Mr. BROWN. We should have had it if you had not prevented us by filibustering. We could not do it on that account. We should have done it but for that.

Mr. DAWES. You had ten majority.

Mr. BROWN. I mean to say we should have acted upon the nomination; I do not know whether we would have confirmed the nominee.

Mr. DAWES. Excuse my interruption.

Mr. BROWN. No interruption at all. Since this session has commenced the President has nominated another gentleman for that position. There is still a vacancy there. Under the law the session of that court at this time ought to be held in Atlanta, my own home. There is no judge to hold the court. The district judge is in bad health and is away from home. The district judge of another State is there to hold the district court, but the business of the circuit court is suffering for want of a judge. As a nomination is before us now for that position, and the public business is suffering there for the want of a judicial appointment, as there is some very important litigation there which ought to be attended to, and the people are very anxious to have the place filled by some proper person, it seems to me it would be much more important at present to attend to that duty than it is just now to attend to the other duty, as Senators on the other side think it is, of electing certain officers of the Senate. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the present with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. CAMDEN, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. LAMAR, (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is detained by sickness, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired for the day with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] unless my vote is necessary to constitute a quorum. If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senater from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I should vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] for the present.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. Assuming that there may be other votes to-day by a call of the yeas and nays, I desire to announce once for all that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still detained from the Senate by sickness and is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I shall not announce the pair again to-day.

Mr. MAXEY. A day or two ago the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] spoke of his expecting to go away, and asked me in the event of his going to pair with him. I told him I should certainly do so with pleasure. I find he is not here, and I do not hear any pair of his announced. Therefore, I shall decline to vote. I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay," if he were present.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired during this day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] The Senator from Colorado would vote "nay," if he were present.

Mr. BROWN, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I did not know that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] had gone away. I am paired with him. I thought he was in the Hall, but as he is away I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. MAXEY. As that pair had not been announced, I declined to vote; but as the Senator from Georgia is paired with the Senator from Colorado, I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the present occupant of the chair, [Mr. ROLLINS.]

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Butler,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sherman.
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—28.

Allison,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Bayard,	George,	McMillan,	Vance,
Brown,	Gorman,	Plumb,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Ransom,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Now nothing hinders our proceeding to take a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Except that I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I regret to hear such a motion offered.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose so, but still I make it without regard to the regret of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator indulge me a moment?

Mr. HARRIS. No, not just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to prevail.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I will state once for all for the rest of the day, that I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called.) I announce for the rest of the day that my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If my colleague were present, and not paired, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As I stated before, I am paired on the votes to-day with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] unless my vote is necessary to constitute a quorum. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] This announcement I make for the day.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Maxey,
Butler,	Groome,	Johnston,	Morgan,
Call,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Lamar,	Slater,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

NAYS—26.

Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—26.

Allison,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Anthony,	Garland,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,
Bayard,	George,	Plumb,	Vest,
Brown,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I believe it was Mr. Benton who said once that the finest figure of speech in the English language was "ding-dong." I agree with him. I desire to tell the Senate again that the President called us together with this recital:

> Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

I wish to add that, whereas the republican party (I will not say the majority, for they have no majority, there is an equal division of the Senate; that is the proper way to put it) have determined to pay no sort of respect to any communications that the President has already sent to us, unless he has other communications to make beyond those that have now come, we are prepared to adjourn without day. If the proposition which I now desire to make is carried, I shall move the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President and advise him that the communications heretofore sent are not such as commend themselves to his party friends, and unless he desires to send us something else we are ready to go home. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on the first Monday in December next, and upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is not debatable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on the first Monday in December, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I move to substitute "to-morrow at twelve o'clock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to amend by substituting that the Senate "adjourn until to-morrow at twelve o'clock."

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment. I do not think it is in the line of public business, and I withdraw it upon further consideration. I could not vote for it myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts and such other Senators on the other side as have not examined the question to the fact that there are now seventy important nominations from the President that have been for more than one week in the hands of the committees of this body, which committees have had no opportunity to report within the week——

Mr. HOAR. I call the Senator from Tennessee to order.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will please state the ground on which he calls the Senator from Tennessee to order.

Mr. HOAR. That is a question between me and the Chair, and not the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order, Mr. President, is, that the Senator from Tennessee is undertaking to state, in violation of the rules of the Senate, the condition of business in executive session, and he is clearly out of order.

Mr. DAWES. I come to the relief of the Senator from Tennessee. He is giving the reasons why he is going to repent of the course he has been pursuing for the last two weeks in delaying business.

Mr. HOAR. If there is any possibility of the Senator's repentance, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not understand the last remark of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I said that if there was any possibility of the Senator repenting, as my colleague suggested, I would withdraw the point of order, that he may repent.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts, who was last up, need withdraw his point of order on that ground. If the Chair holds that the Senator from Tennessee was disclosing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. DAWES. Conditionally.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to call the attention of the Senators to the fact that there lie on the table of the Senate fifty-five important nominations, which have lain there for nearly a week, and some of them more than a week, that have not been referred to the appropriate committees. In addition——

Mr. DAWES. I am compelled, if the Senator will allow me, to inquire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I yield.

Mr. DAWES. For what purpose has the Senator got inside of the sealed communications sent by the President to the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts may see them every day if he wishes.

Mr. COCKRELL. And they are published in the papers.

Mr. HARRIS. They are also published in the papers of this city every day.

Mr. FERRY. I rise to a point of order. The Senator from Tennessee is clearly out of order. He has no right to disclose any business that occurs in executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. Unfortunately, we have not been able to get into executive session for a week, and I am disclosing no fact that has occurred in executive session.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator——

Mr. FERRY. I have the floor, I think.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. FERRY. I raise the point of order that the Senator from Tennessee is out of order in disclosing any business pertaining to the executive sessions of the Senate; and I further state that the Senator cannot speak of his knowledge of such business unless it is a disclosure of the executive business, and he has no right in open session to refer to business that pertains to executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if the fact of nominations having been made to the Senate is an executive secret? If so——

Mr. FERRY. I answer the Senator from Tennessee that I am not responsible for what appears in the public press; I am only insisting here that a member of the Senate has no right, according to the rules, to disclose in open session any business that pertains to executive session. I have raised the point of order, Mr. President, and I hope the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Michigan will disclose executive secrets quite as soon as the Senator from Tennessee will ever disclose them; but I say the fact that a nomination has been sent to the Senate is not an executive secret. The Senator from Michigan mistakes the rule and the law of the case when he asserts that it is.

Mr. FERRY. I further state that the Senator from Tennessee has no right to say that the Senator from Michigan will disclose matters pertaining to executive session in violation of the rules of the Senate any more than the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee did not say so.

Mr. FERRY. I have the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not sure that you have, unless you have it with my permission.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Tennessee has already stated business pertaining to executive session which he has no right to state, according to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I deny the fact stated by the Senator from Michigan; it is untrue. I have stated no fact pertaining to executive session.

Mr. FERRY. I have raised the point of order and I ask the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If Senators will suspend their remarks the Chair will endeavor to decide the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. I take my seat simply that the Chair may decide the point of order, but I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask to have the seventy-third rule read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I ask for the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Before the Chair makes his ruling, I wish to state——

Mr. FERRY. Before the Chair rules upon the question, I wish to say that the Senator from Tennessee has stated there are certain nominations before the executive session of the Senate which have not been referred and others which have been referred. In making this statement he has disclosed business of the Senate in executive session which he has no right to disclose under the rules and practice of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to correct the statement of fact made by the Senator from Michigan. I stated, Mr. President, that there was lying upon your table a number of nominations. We have not been in executive session——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator said that some nominations had been referred and others had not been referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If Senators will suspend for a moment, the Chair will state his views upon the question of order. In the opinion of the Chair the early portion of the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee were not in order. When the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] rose to a point of order, in the opinion of the Chair the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee up to that time were not in order; but the remarks recently submitted to which attention was called by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] are in order, as they merely refer to the nominations which have been sent in and are upon the table.

Mr. DAWES. That is, half of them were out of order and the other half were not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The portion of the Senator's remarks referring to executive business, in the early part of his remarks, in the opinion of the Chair were not in order.

Mr. DAWES and Mr. FERRY addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I desire to know whether the Senator from Tennessee is entitled to occupy the floor? That is the practical point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state further that the Senator from Massachusetts withdrew his point of order. Up to that time the Chair thinks the Senator from Tennessee was not in order.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Chair decides that the Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, I raise no question upon the opinion expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee as a whole are not in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Chair decide that the Senator from Tennessee is not in order in occupying the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, and he will proceed in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire, with the permission of the Senator from Tennessee, to call the attention of the Chair to its ruling. The Chair expressly states that the point of order raised by the Senator from Massachusetts was withdrawn. If it was withdrawn it is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Chair to pass upon it at all, and therefore the ruling of the Chair is extrajudicial. He had no right even to say that on that point the Senator from Tennessee was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HARRIS. There is no decision of the Chair that can be appealed from unless the other side appeal from the decision of the Chair that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, I think the Senator from Delaware has transcended his right on the courtesy of the Senate in criticising the decision of the Chair. His proper method of changing the ruling of the Chair is by an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I called the attention of the Chair to his own ruling.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe the seventy-third rule that was read a while ago announces in explicit terms that the confirmation of nominations is not an executive secret, as is the case with regard to the fact that nominations have been made. There have been a number of confirmations made by the Senate, at least nine important nominations. Before they can take effect it is important that we should have an executive session; it is impossible for them to take effect until we have an executive session. Now, in view of the large number of pending nominations that have not been acted upon, and of the nine important nominations that have been acted upon and confirmed but that cannot take effect until we have another executive session, I appeal to the Senators on the other side to go into executive session in order that this large number of places absolutely vacant until the Senate acts upon these nominations shall be filled. I ask the Senate to go into executive session in order that we may act upon them and let offices that are actually vacant be filled in order that the public business may be performed. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to prevail.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Maxey,
Butler,	Farley,	Johnston,	Morgan,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Teller,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, on Monday last the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] made a speech which he has favored us with in this morning's RECORD, although it was apparently read from printed slips then. Why its publication was delayed until this morning I am not prepared to say; but in it he said this:

Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of this Senate for a few minutes longer, to do justice by one for the introduction of whose name here I am responsible.

I thought the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was responsible for it from the way he talked the other day.

It is reported generally that some Senators of the democratic party are ready and willing to abandon opposition to the further organization of this Senate if the name of Mr. Riddleberger shall be withdrawn. If that be true I ask Senators to confess the fact and let it go to the country, that they are ready and willing to yield the organization of the Senate if only their revenge can be satisfied in the defeat of one of Virginia's own honorable and honored sons, in the person of Captain Riddleberger. They can yield a complete republican organization, but cannot accept this Virginia readjuster. I note with astonishment the reasons assigned, but discern very clearly the real and underlying ones. Say they, he is of the repudiating party. If so, Mr. President, I, too, am of that party.

And again the Senator from Virginia said:

Mr. President, it is the coming contest in Virginia which makes this opposition to Mr. Riddleberger. His enemies and those of his party know his power, his influence, and his courage.

Now I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts whether he had not better take time till morning rather than keep this Senate in session all the while and refuse to confirm nominations as numerous, as important as the Senator from Tennessee has indicated, and see if they cannot raise a little purse among themselves to pay Mr. Riddleberger the amount that he would get between now and December to go into that Virginia election; and thinking it would be cheaper for them to do that than to protract this struggle, I move that the Senate adjourn to give them an opportunity of doing it, and I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BECK. And I want the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator a question, but I will do it after the roll-call.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired as already stated.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Morgan,
Butler,	Farley,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Call,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Camden,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	McPherson,	Voorhees.
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,

NAYS—25.

Blair,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sherman.
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Platt of Conn.,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,

ABSENT—28.

Allison,	Garland,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Anthony,	George,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Bayard,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Vance,
Brown,	Groome,	Morrill,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Plumb,	Vest,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Ransom,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I rose to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question merely for my own information, but the yeas and nays were called on his motion, and I did not have the opportunity to do it then. I desire to do it now. He has taunted this side of the House very frequently, and read statements about our coalition with the readjusters. I should like that Senator, if it is not too much trouble to him—if it is, of course I shall not expect it—to state what his position was in Kentucky in 1866 in this regard, that if the Government of the United States failed to pay the people of Kentucky for the loss of their slaves he then would take a certain position on paying the national debt.

Mr. BECK. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if he has any evidence that I ever took any position at all on that subject. If he has, I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say to the Senator that I remember having read the statement of a certain gentleman in Kentucky, who was a lawyer before a committee——

Mr. BECK. How do you spell that word, l-i-a-r? What was it you said he was?

Mr. DAWES. It is the profession to which the Senator from Kentucky belongs.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know how he spells his own profession; he can spell that to suit himself. I merely say that I remember reading at one time that the Senator from Kentucky had said that if the debt due to the people who lost their slaves in Kentucky was repudiated by the Government, he thought the popular position for a man in that State would be to be in favor of repudiating the national debt, and he thought he would take that position. I do not know whether that was true or not; but I remember having read that.

Mr. BECK. Now I think when the Senator read that he read something not much truer than some statements that were made as to certain affidavits made by people quite close to him, as to the Senator from Illinois and his position at the beginning of the war. Perhaps they can be obtained as well. I decline to answer anything unless some statement is made showing that I ever made any such remark. I say it is a lie.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I suppose the Senator means that the gentleman who made that statement against him lied.

Mr. BECK. No; I mean to say that many things get in the papers which are not true, and the Senator from Illinois had occasion to say yesterday, in response to the Senator from Georgia, that some things in regard to himself had circulated which were not true.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Now, what I mean to say is this: What I did ten years ago or twenty years ago has no more relation to this question than the events that occurred before the flood.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course; I understand that.

Mr. BECK. We are called in executive session to determine certain things. I am talking kindly to convert the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] if I can, and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] The Senator from Illinois and myself have both been lied about, I expect, and we are very fortunate that we have not been lied about more than we have been. I have nothing to defend as to my own personal matters, and I have no accusation to make against him. If I can only get my friend from Massachusetts to see the light as he ought to see it I shall be happy, and I hope the Senator from Illinois and I will not quarrel about our past.

Mr. LOGAN. We shall have no trouble.

Mr. BECK. None in the world.

Mr. LOGAN. I made this reference without any intention whatever of arousing the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I know it.

Mr. LOGAN. But I remember—and he recollects it very well—the report that was made in the House, and I remember reading—I do not recall the gentleman's name now—the evidence of a gentleman before that committee, in which he stated these facts about the Senator, and I merely asked him whether they were true or not.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; nothing of that sort was ever said before a committee. I came before the House, one of nine Representatives from Kentucky, and the Senator from Illinois was kind enough to remark then—and the record will show it—that I had been the law partner of Hon. John C. Breckinridge, and that was quite enough to keep me out, and I was kept out for a good while; but a republican committee, on which were Burton C. Cook, Glenni W. Scofield, and others, went to my own town and investigated my character and my position, and they unanimously reported that I was entitled to my seat, and I got it.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not talking about the Senator's position in that regard.

Mr. BECK. I was kept out at the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I called the Senator's attention to but one point. How was that?

Mr. BECK. I think I was kept out a good while at the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, honestly made, no doubt.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, I did make the suggestion myself in the House. I did object to the Senator taking the oath as a member when he first appeared there.

Mr. BECK. But a committee of your own party cleared me of every charge.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not allude to that or intend to do so; but what I asked the Senator was whether it was true at that time that he did take the position that he was in favor of repudiating the national debt if the United States refused to pay for the slaves in Kentucky. I did not know whether that was true or not; I merely ask him that question.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have announced that no such statement was ever made before any committee, and I never saw it; and if it was made, it was a lie.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. And if it is produced I will prove it to be a lie. I do not talk about falsehoods or mistakes. It is what I have said. No such statement was ever made by me. The men who called themselves loyal in Kentucky were fooled by pretenses on the part of the republican party, just as when Lincoln was nominated it was proclaimed that the rights of the States and the rights of all the people should be preserved in all their property unimpaired; and when there was a little trouble over at Bull Run, which perhaps you will remember, the Congress of the United States made haste to declare that they were not waging the war for any purpose except to maintain the rights of the States with all their dignity unimpaired; and they got 80,000 troops from Kentucky under all sorts of fraudulent pretenses. I knew they were lying all the time.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Kentucky to say——

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to end my little controversy with his colleague.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator sat down.

Mr. BECK. There were some remarks between him and the Senator from Georgia that perhaps ought to be noticed, but I would rather not go into a controversy with the Senator, if he will allow me.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky resumed his seat, and I rose to make sure by a question whether I correctly understood the honorable Senator. I rise to ask if the honorable Senator did at this moment say that the 80,000 loyal troops that went from the State of Kentucky to the defense of their country went in because they were fooled and because of certain fraudulent pretenses? I understood the Senator to charge somebody made a fraudulent pretense after the repulse at the battle of Bull Run, and then to add that statement, and I desired to know before it passed away whether I understood him correctly.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. The resolution of July 22, 1861, which I have not now before me, was the ground upon which the men of Kentucky who joined the Federal Army took up arms for the Federal Union, and after the war was over, if I were to go into all the reconstruction measures, I could show that they were wofully deceived, and that while bills were passed to pay so-called loyal men for their slaves, their operation was suspended, and afterward withdrawn; and all this was done to hold Kentucky, at least when it never was intended to comply with the obligation they professed to enter into. I think I can show that some of these days.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire——

Mr. FARLEY. I do not wish to make talk, but I had the floor, and I notice that it has become customary on the floor of the Senate that Senators rise and commence talking without being recognized by the Chair at all. That seems to be the rule. There appears to be a promiscuous wrangling on the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will suspend his remarks for a moment. The Chair recognized the Senator from Kentucky, as the Chair supposed he desired to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, and did not recognize the Senator from California.

Mr. FARLEY. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely——

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator from Illinois immediately took the floor and talked without being recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. When I asked the Senator from Kentucky for a response to the question, I did so not for the purpose of getting up a controversy between the Senator from Kentucky and any of his constituents; but I merely asked him to state the fact and he said that any person who would say that he had ever made the remark I mentioned was a liar. I do not know anything about the parties; perhaps he can say who they are. I find, however, by examining the record that the name is William C. Goodloe, who was sworn and examined before the committee to which I alluded. The Senator said that no such thing was ever stated before a committee.

Mr. BECK. Read it.

Mr. LOGAN. I first want to know what the character of Mr. Goodloe is so as to know whether I ought to read it or not.

Mr. BECK. Be kind enough to read the statement.

Mr. LOGAN. It is this, and Mr. BECK was present at the examination:

I have heard him say—

Speaking of Mr. BECK—

that he thought he would canvass for Congress in favor of repudiation, but that was before he was a candidate.

Mr. BECK then asked him a question.

Q. Do you recollect whether my talk about repudiation was in connection with what I claim was the repudiation of the slave debt of Kentucky?

A. I do not think there was any conversation on the subject. There were several gentlemen standing on the street, and as I was passing, I stopped. You presently remarked that you believed you would be a candidate in favor of repudiation. I know that a good many men here who claimed to be Unionists at the start are advocating repudiation on the ground that Kentucky had not been paid for her slaves. It was a mere casual remark of yours. You never undertook to give me your views on the question. I do not know now that you are for repudiation.

That is what I alluded to. This witness stated that he heard you say that you had a notion of being a candidate for Congress in favor of repudiation, and I merely asked you the question whether it was true or not.

Mr. BECK. This gentleman was then judge of the circuit court, and perhaps the most ultra republican in Kentucky. I took occasion when I was charged by the Senator from Illinois with not being a fit man to sit in the House to summon all the ultra republicans I could find, and I made them prove my course. While I never believed a word of what these men said, that they were fighting to maintain the Constitution as it was and the rights of the States, with all their dignity and property unimpaired, I required each one of those men to say that I obeyed every law, whether I liked it or not, and I did obey all the laws. When Judge Goodloe, who was the judge of my circuit court, and perhaps the most ultra republican in the State, undertook to give some talk about what was taking place at the time of the discontent in Kentucky, because we were not paid for our property after Congress had passed an act that we should be, I may have said very likely that a certain course would be popular, and that I would run on some idea of that sort; but I never said, and nobody ever declared that I said, that I was in favor of repudiation, for I never was. I knew it was not true. Judge Goodloe states there that he did not know what my opinions were, but simply ventures some things said in the course of a talk, perhaps on a county court day, when he met and I met hundreds of people, and on such occasions the Senator from Illinois has talked freely himself, many a time.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desired the Senator to explain——

Mr. BECK. I never repudiated and never will. I will pay every obligation, personal and national, State and every other that I am liable for.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely found this record, and I thought the Senator could explain it probably.

Mr. BECK. Certainly; that was all right.

Mr. LOGAN. Judge Goodloe, I have understood, was a very honorable man. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BECK. Yes, and a worse republican than you ever dared to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not believe that I can stand here and see my friend from Kentucky slandered in this way.

Mr. BECK. That is right. I knew you would come to the rescue.

Mr. DAWES. I have served with him in the House; I was on the committee to which his disloyalty was submitted, and I reported in his favor, and the House sustained the report and admitted him to the House, and while he was on his feet in the House, as in the Senate, he uttered the most perverse political sentiments of anybody I ever listened to. [Laughter.] But I never doubted his loyalty; and according to his judgment, strangely perverted as it is, I believe he sincerely is devoted to the Union and the defenders of the flag, and I will not sit here and let my friend from Illinois slander him in that way. He is wrong now on this question of electing the officers of the Senate, but I think he was right there. There was a broad distinction between his conduct and that of some unfortunate men who came up here aspiring to be his colleagues in the House, upon whose position the House differed with the Senator from Kentucky; but I stand here to vindicate him against that charge and to implore him to forget this recent error of his ways and abandon it, and stand with me for order in the Senate and the proper and regular organization of the Senate.

I was on my feet to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky, or of the Senator from Ohio, who may speak with more authority for that side of the House than him, as it is getting late this afternoon——

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say a word right here. I know that the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, being made rather in a jocular way——

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Well, if they were not, then I take exception to them, and say to the Senator——

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon.

Mr. LOGAN. If he means to say that I am slandering the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no! I beg pardon. I did not mean you were slandering him; I meant that the implication in the paper did injustice.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator wholly misunderstood it. The Senator is defending the Senator from Kentucky on the ground of his loyalty. I asked him the question whether he had at any time, according to a statement made before a committee of the other House, been in favor of repudiating the national debt because we had not paid for the slaves. I said nothing about his loyalty.

Mr. DAWES. I would not undertake to defend him against that charge as to the national debt. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I did not want the RECORD to show such a statement; for the people who read the RECORD do not understand the jokes that are passing in this Senate. I do not want any such thing as that to go to the country without contradiction.

Mr. DAWES. I thought in all seriousness that the Senator from Illinois—if I mistook him I beg his pardon—was arraigning the loyalty of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I said nothing about it.

Mr. DAWES. I knew that the Senator from Kentucky was looking upon the chairman of the committee who reported that he was loyal, and I thought it was due to him to say it. So far as the Senator from Kentucky wanted to repudiate the national debt, I am unable to defend him because I do not know exactly how that was.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, to show the Senator from Massachusetts how desirous I am that everything shall go on in order and that I am loyal to all the orders of the President and to the decorum of the Senate and alive to the importance of carrying on the public business properly, and to quiet all this thing about repudiation, Riddleberger, and all, I shall move, in order that we may have a full supreme bench, proper officers to collect customs at New York, proper attorneys, proper judges, and postmasters everywhere, that we quit all this foolishness and proceed to the consideration of executive business, and I now move that we do, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Kentucky that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is not debatable. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BECK. I will withdraw it to hear a suggestion.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to make an inquiry, when from a misunderstanding I was interrupted by the Senator from Illinois. I did not intend to interfere with that argument; but I was upon my feet to make an inquiry, which with his permission I will make now, of the Senator from Kentucky or of the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator on that side. Can we not agree upon a time to-night when we will stop debate and take the vote upon this resolution?

Mr. BECK. The first Monday in December next; we have proposed it over and over.

Mr. DAWES. Before we adjourn, I said. Is it not possible for us to come to some understanding that we shall take the vote on this resolution before we adjourn? If the Senator from Ohio thinks we cannot do that——

Mr. PENDLETON. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio in the interest of the public business to know if we cannot agree upon some hour that we shall take the vote on this resolution before we adjourn?

Mr. PENDLETON. This evening?

Mr. DAWES. This evening.

Mr. PENDLETON. But we must go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. If there is no chance of an agreement with Senators on the other side, in the interest of the public business, upon some time at which we shall take the vote before adjournment, I feel justified, pending the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, in moving to adjourn myself. I move that the Senate adjourn, hoping that the Senators on the other side will come here to-morrow feeling that they ought to proceed with the public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 1, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TESTS OF IRON.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report, dated September 11, 1880, of the officer in charge of the United States testing machine upon the resistance to internal pressures of thick hollow cylinders of American cast-iron, and of similar cylinders when lined with coiled wrought-iron and bronze tubes.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the object of the resolution?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It merely calls for a report made to the War Department in pursuance of an appropriation, and not communicated to the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I have a few words to say upon the pending resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the Senator from Mississippi is not anxious to go on at this moment with his remarks, I think it might be advisable to give our friends upon the other side an opportunity to go now into the consideration of executive business. If they still refuse to do it, which we shall immediately ascertain by such a motion, I am sure the Senate will be glad to hear the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LAMAR. I take great pleasure in yielding to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and will gladly forego the privilege of making any remarks if Senators on the other side are prepared to go into executive session.

Mr. PENDLETON. We will give them an opportunity. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) Yesterday I was paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I do not see him in his seat this morning. The pair is to continue until his return. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. CAMDEN, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] on this question. If he were here I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent, and his pair continues with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I announce that for the day.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] He is not in the Chamber this morning, and I will continue the pair for the present, unless my vote be necessary to constitute a quorum, when I shall vote. I would vote "nay." The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] The Senator from Colorado, if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, an entire month, saving two or three days, has elapsed since the commencement of this session. The President of the United States called us together on the 4th day of March. We are here, as a part of the treaty-making department of the Government and also as a part of the executive department. We were called here for the purpose of adjusting our relations with foreign nations and confirming appointments nominated by the President. This, and this alone, is the business for which this body was convened. It is here in no legislative capacity, but simply, I repeat, as a branch of the treaty-making and executive department of the Government; and yet, sir, though that long time has elapsed, this body has scarcely entered upon the discharge of the business which it was called specially to consider.

This attitude of the Senate is an extraordinary one and has no precedent in the history of this country. It is the result of a determination of thirty-eight Senators, aided by the Vice-President, not to allow the body to enter upon the business which it was called to consider until it shall first disorganize the Senate as it now stands, and to reorganize it with reference to certain party ends, which I will endeavor to disclose.

I repeat, sir, that the announcement has been made that the business for which this body has been convoked shall not be entered upon until certain officers of the Senate are deposed and certain other persons named in a resolution on the Clerk's desk shall be installed in their places; and so determined is this purpose that from day to day these thirty-eight Senators go through the form of attempting to do what it is manifest they cannot do, and then persistently refuse to do what it is manifest they can do, what they were called here to do, what it is their constitutional duty to do, and what they admit the pressing interests of the country require them to do.

Not only that, sir, but if report be true, and it is nowhere denied, they intend to continue this state of things indefinitely. One Senator, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] declared that the accomplishment of this purpose had become a mere question of endurance, and he proposed to sit it out. When another Senator upon this side of the Chamber, in response to that suggestion, declared that it was his purpose and that of his associates to meet that endurance with an equal endurance on this side even if it should take to June or December—the end of the session—another Senator, so intense and proscriptive seems to be this purpose, arose and said that he regarded that declaration of purpose by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] as a declaration which contained the very essence of revolution and of treason to the institutions of this country.

Mr. President, this is a grave accusation—I will not say a dishonoring one, for the Senator uttering it disclaimed any such intention. It was certainly a grave reflection upon thirty-eight fellow-members of this body. If it was true, it devolves upon these thirty-eight Senators a terrible responsibility. If it be not true, how stands the matter then with the Senator making it? I propose to analyze this proposition and to determine whether it be true or untrue. What is it? That thirty-eight Senators, one-half of the body, have determined that before the business for which this Senate was called shall be proceeded with, certain officers of this body shall be deposed and other persons put in their places; and when notice is given that the thirty-eight Senators upon this side will not allow that to be done so far as they can prevent it by a resort to the parliamentary rules of this body, we are told that it is revolution and treason in its purpose and character.

Where is the element of treason or revolution in this action? I can very well see that if the Senate was disorganized, or rather unorganized; if there were vacancies in the offices, instead of being fully equipped and prepared to proceed with business as it now is, opposition to the filling of those vacancies protracted to the end of the session would be factious, unpatriotic, reprehensible; but such is not the case here. The Senate is fully equipped in every respect; its clerks are at the desk; its Sergeant-at-Arms is at his post; and the pages and messengers are all alert in the performance of their duties.

I can very well see that during a session if important appointments were to be made or treaties to be negotiated, or if other things were to be done, and a minority should announce its purpose that none of these things should be done until the expiration of the session, that that minority would place itself before the country in a position of factious partisanship. But here nothing of that kind exists. It is simply a proposition upon the one side by thirty-eight members, one-half of this body, that the whole Senate shall proceed to the discharge of the business for which it was called together and which every Senator upon the floor admits it to be his constitutional duty to attend to, and which every Senator must admit is at this time of pressing urgency.

Mr. President, think of it one moment. We are charged with announcing a doctrine replete with the elements of treason and revolution for making motions against which not even a parliamentary point of order will lie; treason and revolution for making motions with reference to which not even a parliamentary inquiry can be made.

I shall not pursue this subject any further, sir. I proceed at once to address myself to the question, Are we, having the power to do this thing in accordance with the rules of this body and the principles of the Constitution, justified in exercising that power as we have done? Upon the prima facie case, as the matter stands, to those who look upon it simply as it presents itself upon the face of our proceedings, the thirty-eight members upon this side must be justified. Their course is sustained by the unbroken usages of the body and also by the very terms of the proclamation which convoked us here. Then why should we not proceed in accordance with these usages and in conformity with the call of the Executive? Why should a resolution be put right at the threshold of our executive session and this body stand balked and paralyzed so that it can do no business?

Gentlemen tell us that a majority, a constitutional majority, thirty-eight members aided by the Vice-President, wish to remove certain officers and put others in, and that this alone is a sufficient reason. They insist that when the majority of the Senate determine to change its officers it is the duty of the minority to allow it to be done, and that to prevent it is to fly in the face of the Constitution. I cannot concur in this view. In the first place you are not the majority in this Senate, nor are we the minority. We have as many votes as you have. The fact that it is your will not to proceed to the legitimate business of the session, but to go into this election, does not furnish a sufficient reason for us to succumb to your will merely because you are aided by the casting vote of the President. I respectfully submit that if so serious a departure from the usages of the Senate is insisted upon with such inflexible purpose some good reason should be given for it other than that it is the will of the constitutional majority, especially when that majority is obtained by the casting vote of the Vice-President. That reason has not yet been stated, unless it may be considered as having been disclosed yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] which I shall presently consider.

Sir, there is something else by which thirty-eight members of the Senate must be controlled than the mere announcement that such is the will of the constitutional majority. The framers of our Constitution took a great step in political science and in the practical advancement of human rights when they proclaimed to the world and wrote it in their organic law that minorities should never oppress majorities; but it was a still greater step that gave minorities the right and the means of protecting themselves against even the oppressions of majorities.

I admit that if there is any especial, overruling, dominating reason for this departure from the usages of the body these thirty-eight Senators on the other side are justified in their demand, but they must give the reason, they must address themselves to the great tribunal of public opinion, for they will not be sustained by the mere declaration that it is the will of the majority, and that it is treason and revolution to obstruct it, even though the means of that obstruction be the barriers of the Constitution itself.

What are your reasons? We know what they are not. This change which is demanded, and for the carrying out of which the Senate has been kept here one whole month and its energies and its action benumbed, is not demanded by any considerations of civil-service reform, which I understand to be a great object with one school of republican politicians; for tributes of praise and commendation of the efficiency and competency of the existing incumbents come from all sides of the Chamber. Then, so far as the competent and efficient equipment of this body is concerned, there can be no reason looking in the direction of civil-service reform to justify this extraordinary action and the extraordinary delay which it has produced.

What, then, is the reason why these gentlemen insist upon subordinating the filling of the vacancies in the judicial system of the country, of appointing ministers abroad, of perfecting our treaties with foreign nations, to the single and sole purpose of turning out a few officers admitted to be competent and efficient and putting in others whose competency and efficiency is yet to be tested? What is the reason? It certainly cannot be in reward for distinguished political services to the party, which I believe is the doctrine of another school of republican politicians, for the most prominent gentlemen proposed to be put in that position are men who have signalized their talents and their activity in opposition to that party, not only in the last campaign upon which the republican and democratic parties met in conflict, but also in the preceding campaign, where the nominated candidate for the Secretaryship supported other banners and other candidates than those under which the republican organization of his State was mustered. Upon the contrary, in the beginning of this debate a Senator who avows himself responsible for the nomination of one of these gentlemen upon this floor announced himself not a republican but an independent. He declared himself to be a better democrat than my friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] himself, but that he was an independent, and would not support the democratic nominations or be bound by a democratic caucus, although it appears that he is perfectly willing to be bound—no, sir, not to be bound by, but to bind in shackles and manacles the republican caucus. So, then, it cannot be for the purpose of rewarding political service that this extraordinary position, this extraordinary delay has been superinduced.

The question grows in urgency! What is the pressing and all-controlling reason of public policy or of public interest that puts us in this extraordinary attitude of inactivity and inaction? It certainly cannot be any great zeal in behalf of loyalty to the Union. That is often a rallying cry and a justification for many extraordinary measures. It is not proposed to put gentlemen out who were infected with the heresy of secession in order to put in others who have been distinguished for their loyalty, for if I mistake not the title of one of these candidates to our confidence and suffrages as presented by his sponsor on this floor is that he was a captain of cavalry and did gallant service in the confederate army.

I know there is a distinction drawn and repeatedly drawn by Senators on the other side, that while they will condone and forgive connection and implication with secession and the secession movement they will not do it, they will not grasp hands "across the bloody chasm" or any chasm, with any man connected with that movement who will not confess his sins, profess his repentance, and admit that he was wrong and they were right. But, sir, that cannot be the motive here, inasmuch as the Senator who brings forward one of these candidates and avows his responsibility for him, also avowed upon this floor that he was true to the confederate cause, did it service upon the plains of Virginia, and that he has no apologies to offer for it here or elsewhere.

Now, sir, while this stubborn, intense, inflexible, unyielding determination to put these gentlemen into office before any of the great interests of this country can be attended to by this body evinces on the part of these gentlemen a wholesome and salutary advance in liberal sentiments, it does not furnish, I think, an adequate motive for the zeal, for the determination to subordinate every other great interest of the country to this single object.

Then, sir, what is the motive; what is the object? There must be something. What is it? Why do you not tell your reason for it? I challenge you, gentlemen, I defy you to announce it; I taunt you to the avowal of it. It certainly cannot be, I do not believe it is, from any sympathy with the cause of that accursed doctrine of repudiation which all of you have so often held up to the execration and abhorrence of all the tribes of the earth. I know that no Senators upon that side have any sympathy with that doctrine. They have already, those of them who have spoken, repudiated repudiation in the most unmistakable and emphatic language.

Then, if it be neither civil-service reform, nor the reward of political service, nor the condonation of service to the cause of secession, nor any new-born love of repudiation, what is your motive for holding this body here away from the discharge of its exalted duties upon a mere question of the distribution of a few offices? Well, sir, although not avowed, the true reason has been disclosed in one way or another. It appears that there was a schism in the democratic party of Virginia. It also appears that the majority section of that party, the section that controlled the organization, did in conjunction with the public creditors make a settlement of the debt of that Commonwealth acceptable to both; that they stood for the discharge of public obligations and the preservation of the plighted faith of that grand and glorious old Commonwealth. It appears that another wing dissented from the regular organization, raised the banner of revolt against it, and against the public creditors of the State, denouncing the bill upon which they had settled as "a broker's bill," and proposing to settle upon other terms acceptable only to themselves.

[At this point a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, through Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

I will yield the floor to the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator to move to go into executive session to consider the President's message just received if they think it will be desirable.

Mr. PENDLETON. If it does not interfere with the course of the remarks of the Senator, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that executive message.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] until he returns.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I see the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his seat, and I vote "nay."

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired on this and kindred questions with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of Illinois,	Harris,	Morgan,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi having yielded the floor——

Mr. LAMAR. I had the floor, and yielded it for this purpose only. If the gentleman from Massachusetts chooses to take me off my feet, so be it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DAWES. Not at this moment. I was about to say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Mississippi having yielded the floor in his anxiety to proceed with the public business, I hoped that he would co-operate with us on this side in pressing upon the consideration of the Senate the pending measure, and that we might have a vote.

Mr. LAMAR. I will respond to the Senator from Massachusetts. Does he think that the removal of Mr. Burch from the Secretaryship of this Senate is more important than filling the vacancy upon the Supreme Court, which is not now in session in consequence of that vacancy? Will he say that the disorganization of, simply for the purpose of reorganizing, this body is a matter of more supreme importance than the filling of the vacancies in the circuit court, whose business is suffering at this very moment? I hope, Mr. President, that——

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. LAMAR. I will yield to interruptions, but I will express my strong desire that my friends on the other side will permit me to make my remarks continuously, pledging myself to answer any question or correct any misstatement that I may have fallen into in the course of my remarks.

Mr. DAWES. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator; I know how embarrassing that is, and I have not risen for that purpose. I thought he put a question to me which he wanted me to answer now, but if he does not of course I do not insist.

Mr. LAMAR. The Senator from Massachusetts did not allow me to finish my questions, and for fear of another interruption I will proceed with the remarks that I was making when this motion to go into executive session was made on this side of the Chamber, and, as usual, voted down by the other.

I was saying that a division had taken place in the democratic party of Virginia; that a majority of that party, constituting its regular organization, had, standing upon the doctrine of inviolable public faith, settled the debt upon terms acceptable to the creditors of the State, and that a section of that party had bolted and raised the banner of revolt against that settlement, and had by a combination with the negro voters of that State, taking them in large part away from their republican leaders, defeated the democratic party and got possession of the Legislature.

The question has been brought here in the distribution of these offices of the Senate, and we find the republican Senators, thirty-eight members of this body, by their action proclaiming their readiness and willingness to combine with what the whole country calls the repudiating wing of the democratic party in Virginia.

Now, sir, I do not charge those Senators with any sympathy for the repudiation doctrines ascribed to that faction, but I do say, and I challenge contradiction, that they have proclaimed to the country that whenever any part or section of a party shall bolt from the democracy of a Southern State under the banner of repudiation, under the banner of a refusal to pay the public debt of that State, the republican party will—I do not say countenance repudiation—but in spite of it will embrace that repudiating faction, give it the strength and support of its recognition, and clothe its leaders with the prizes of national office and emoluments.

Is it not so, sir? Why, sir, what did we witness a few days ago? The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] addressed this body upon the subject of the relations of the two parties to the debt of Virginia. In the course of his argument he was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] He had stated that the debt of Virginia was in round numbers, $29,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. You state that to be the correct amount?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir; on that authority of the statement of the readjuster legislature.

Mr. DAWES. What interest does it bear?

Mark, sir, how he put the Senator from Virginia upon a cross-examination—"What interest does it bear?"

Mr. JOHNSTON. A portion of it bears 3 and a portion 6.

Notice, Mr. President, the minuteness of the inquiries of the Senator from Massachusetts, how particular he is to know the very bottom facts of this affair.

Mr. DAWES. What portion of it bears 6?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I can tell the Senator exactly in a moment. The portion of it that bears 3 per cent. is $7,944,315.80. The balance of it is at 6 per cent.

Mr. DAWES. Are you in favor of paying that sum and that interest?

There stood the Senator from Virginia. He had just come out of a campaign in which he had confronted the combination of readjusters and the negro vote of his State when his party had gone down, and there stood the threatened combination. The Senator from Massachusetts pins him to the point, "Are you in favor of paying that sum?" And the Senator from Virginia, modest and unobtrusive, conscious of the integrity of his own action, replies:

I am in favor of paying everything that we are justly bound to pay; but I am in favor, if the creditor will accept it, of paying a less rate of interest.

Not one word of applause, no ringing of galleries, or sending of bouquets to this man who, in the simple rectitude of his nature, makes this honest avowal before the country in favor of good faith and plighted honor. What else, sir? Not satisfied with this question and not satisfied with the answer, the astute and acute Senator from Massachusetts must ply him with other cross-interrogatories.

Mr. DAWES. But are you willing to pay that sum and the interest?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yea, I am in favor of paying that sum and the interest. I am in favor of paying every cent which the State owes.

Mr. DAWES. Has the State provided for the payment of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir, it has not. There are some arrearages of interest on a portion of the debt. The debt stands in a very peculiar condition. On a portion of the debt the coupons are receivable for taxes; on another portion they are not.

Now the Senator from Massachusetts again comes in. I confess, Mr. President, that I was astonished at the difference in the spirit with which these two Senators addressed each other; one with his mind simply bent upon giving the information fairly and fully, and the other upon eliciting avowals about which there could be no mistake. But to proceed:

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator state fairly that he is in favor of paying the debt according to that statement and the interest in full prescribed by the law?

With simple courage, with unaffected truth, he answers without any rhetorical flourish:

Yes, I am.

Does that satisfy the Senator? No, sir; not satisfied yet of the honesty of this Senator from Virginia. What next?

Mr. DAWES. And of course providing by taxation to meet the interest?

That was to be the point at which the startled steed was expected to shy. Here was the answer:

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Baffled at that point he asks again:

And I suppose in that respect the Senator represents the action of his own party?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand it so.

Mr. DAWES. I am very glad to have the opportunity of giving the Senator the advantage of that statement.

I thought at the time he was the most rueful and mournful specimen or impersonation of high gratification that I ever saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. My sentiments on that subject have never been disguised from anybody—

With some other remarks on that point.

Mr. DAWES. It was not from any doubt I had, but it was the gratification—

"The gratification!"—

It was not from any doubt I had, but it was the gratification I should feel in hearing the Senator state it publicly on this floor.

He seemed to love his brother Senator with "love surpassing that of woman." But what else?

Mr. JOHNSTON. It gratifies you to know what you knew before or ought to have known without asking the question.

The Senator from Massachusetts is not yet satisfied.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say that I regret——

Oh, dear sensibility!

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say that I regret exceedingly that he has not kept his own party up to that high standard while they have been in power in the State of Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is very much troubled.

Mr. DAWES. I regret it exceedingly because on that position I agree with the Senator that every dollar of the debt and of its interest should be paid in full. I only regret that when his party has been in power and has sent so able a representative to the national councils, he has been unable to hold his party up to that point.

He regrets that he cannot hold up his party; that some fell back and would not stand up to him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The party that I belong to has been held up to that point.

Mr. DAWES. I understand his party to have been in power up to this last Legislature, and still they have not provided for the debt. I may be mistaken, perhaps.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir. There have been various bills for the settlement of the debt, but they were defeated by one means or other by the readjusters, although they did not have a distinct organization.

I have no further remarks to make upon that passage at arms, if you may call it such, for I do not think that the Senator from Virginia so considered it; but I must say that for once in his life my friend from Massachusetts came out second best.

The Senator from Virginia had here just a year ago a brave, gallant, high-toned colleague, (Mr. Withers,) who stood side by side with him on that position, which it so gratified the Senator from Massachusetts to elicit a public avowal of here on this floor. That Senator, who was my friend's colleague, went with him before the people on the issue and they appealed to that people together. His colleague was a candidate for re-election. He stood before his people, and appealed to them to hold aloft the character of the grand old Commonwealth. He told them whatever might be their impoverishment; whatever the sacrifices they would have to make, repudiation would entail upon them still greater loss and embarrassment; that in the disregard of public obligations, the breach of plighted faith, the repaying of trust in their honor with perfidy and dishonor, they would turn their backs upon the noble qualities which are essential to the prosperity of States, while resources undeveloped, energies unemployed, vanishing capital would be their swift and sure retribution.

But, sir, those appeals were in vain. The black allies of his opponents rallied around the other doctrine, and he was defeated; but in this day of defeat I believe he is sustained by a conscious rectitude which he would not barter for all this Government's honors and all its wealth besides. His successor is here, and has addressed the Senate in reply to his colleague. Suffering from a throbbing headache on that day, I was unable to attend to and understand the expounding of the position he holds in reference to the debt of his State. I cannot upon my own responsibility assert that he advocated the truncation or the diminution of that debt at the option of the debtor, or that he was in favor of repudiating it either in whole or in part; nor have I had the opportunity since the speech has been published to give it that careful reading which would justify any criticism or comment upon it.

But, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts could relieve me of that difficulty if he would only ply the junior Senator from Virginia with the same questions that he put to his colleague. If he would ask him what the whole amount of the debt of Virginia is, and ask him, with that prying inquisitiveness and minuteness so characteristic of him, "Are you in favor of paying that debt? Are you in favor of paying the whole of it, principal and interest? Are you in favor of taxing your people to pay it?" it would have been fair, and we should all have rejoiced had the replies been as definite as those of the other Senator. But, sir, why did not the Senator from Massachusetts do it? Why was he so particular in the questions addressed to one Senator from Virginia and so incurious about the position of the other on the subject in question? I noticed that the Senator from Massachusetts listened with riveted and pleased attention to the delivery of that speech.

I would be glad to know if the Senator who delivered that speech kept himself up to the high standard which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] so fully indorsed and so highly applauded in his colleague. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think that he did keep up to that standard? And if he did not, does the Senator exceedingly regret it?

The senior Senator from Virginia may be congratulated upon his indorsement by the Senator from Massachusetts. Thus panoplied he is invulnerable, even to the heel, against any attack from his opponent. But why has not the Senator from Massachusetts expressed his deep regret and mortification that such an attack upon the position of Mr. JOHNSTON, thus indorsed and approved by him, should have been made by his colleague?

The contest—

Said the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] yesterday—

in which we are engaged is not simply to secure the officers and employés to party friends, as the Senators on the other side pretend, nor is it solely a struggle of the majority to maintain its right to control the organization of the body. There is something higher than and above all this.

Well, that depends now upon the point from which you view it. What seem height to one man may seem depth to another. Let us see what this higher thing is which the Senator from Pennsylvania could not contemplate upon a dead level but must look up to a something above the important business before this Senate. What is it that is higher than the business for which the President has called us together, involving as it does our relations with foreign nations and the supplying of this Government with its essential officers, agents, and employés?

There is something higher than and above all this.

Now, hold your breath to hear. Let the Senate and the people listen to what has brought about this extraordinary contest in this Chamber:

It is the coming political contest in Virginia.

The election of Colonel Riddleberger to a responsible office in this body will be the best proof that could be given that for all true men who uphold the laws the republican party has confidence, respect, and co-operation. We give our votes to that gentleman—as an earnest that we are not sectional and that we have no prejudices on account of old conflicts. Whoever is right at the present time is our friend and we are his. This, and this only, is the "bargain" we have to offer to all our southern friends who will come out from the party of reaction and grow with the nation's growth. All that we ask is that they shall stand with us in favor of securing to each lawful voter the right to cast one free and unintimidated ballot and to have it honestly counted. We know, and our opponents know, that if Virginia takes her stand upon that platform the solid South is a thing of the past.

Speaking of Colonel Riddleberger—

Here it is at last avowed. It is "the coming political contest in Virginia" and "the election of Colonel Riddleberger to a responsible office in this body." That is the true cause of all this contention, and it grins through the gossamer rhetoric with which the Senator from Massachusetts has decked it. The coming political contest in Virginia is the thing for which this Senate is here held inactive and prevented from performing the exalted functions with which it is clothed by the Constitution and for which it has been convoked by the Chief Magistrate of the nation; that you, the republican Senators, may organize this Senate of the United States with reference to the interests of a party campaign in the State of Virginia.

This avowal of the Senator from Pennsylvania furnishes the confirmation, if confirmation were needed, of the statement which I have made that this is a movement to ally the republican party with any body of men which will leave "the party of reaction," as it is called, and come into its embrace, no matter how much begrimed with the foul doctrine of repudiation or readjustment, whichever term gentlemen may prefer. I do not mean to say that the republican party means to adopt this doctrine itself; quite the contrary, But I do mean to say that they intend to treat it as a subordinate issue and no hinderance to their alliance with them, and are now seeking to confer the offices of this body upon men who are accredited by the leading republican journals of the country with allegiance to this doctrine, notwithstanding they may as unrepentant rebels avow themselves as having no apologies to make either here or elsewhere.

Mr. President, this is indeed a new departure initiated by Senators here, and I do not believe it will result in success. I do not believe that the northern people will sustain it. I believe I know the public sentiment of the North better than the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and better than his colleague, [Mr. HOAR,] not that I arrogate immodestly to myself any superiority over them or even deny my own mental inferiority. But the costly experience of my people has constrained me to study the currents of public opinion at the North closely, intensely, and with anxious solicitude. The Senators are in it and of it, but they do not see it in the perspective, they do not contemplate it in the objective, as I have found it necessary to do; and from a long and attentive observance of its indications, I say here with entire confidence that the people of the North, with all their complications of business interests based upon the inviolability of contracts will not tolerate this alliance with repudiating movements in the Southern States. I say, sir, that the sentiment of commercial honor at the North will not stand it. I say that the sensitiveness of the North as to the public credit of this nation will not abide it. The combination will be dashed to pieces, even though the shock of the blow should cause the republican party to totter upon its base. Gentlemen, say what you may, national honor, national good faith, with all its vigor, cannot take into its embrace the leprous body of State repudiation without becoming infected with the poison.

Sir, with equal confidence I venture to predict that this movement will fail in the South. The moral sentiment of that people is sound. The majority of the democratic party there is standing up for the observance of the strictest good faith in public obligations, and those who would disregard them are sloughing off from that party and seeking other alliances. Spewed out of its mouth, republican Senators are snapping at and astounding the country with their convulsive efforts to utilize this offal. It is, sir, an attempt to bring the republican party in the South into relations with this element such as it held to the carpet-bag governments there, and to substitute the one for the other, using the Federal patronage now where they used Federal bayonets then.

The first experiment brought untold suffering to the southern people but secured the republican party no permanent establishment among the intelligent and responsible class of citizens in that country. The second will have no greater success. The same appliances of Federal patronage have been tried before and have failed. Who does not know that the high offices of this Government have been held out to southern men as rewards for political tergiversation?

In the direful days of reconstruction, when every State in the South was a perfect pandemonium, I heard a brilliant man from the North and another from the South, standing by his side, appealing to the young men of ambition, and of high and noble aspirations, to join their party for the reason that it furnished the only avenue to honorable distinction, riches, and fame. A few were enticed by the glittering allurement, and are to-day bitterly lamenting their delusion; but the great body of the young men of the South, the professional men, the lawyers, the doctors, and the young planters and farmers, all hurled contempt upon the miserable alternative. They preferred to live a life of obscurity and poverty and to earn their bread in the sweat of their brows rather than to rise while virtue, honor, intellect, and country were sinking. For ten long years they bided their time in the trust that God, whose attributes ever side with the right, would again enthrone the right in triumph and dispense its honors to the brave, the conscientious, and the true.

Sir, you cannot with the mere agencies of Federal power and patronage fabricate a party in the Southern States, not at least among that portion of the people which represents the highest, best, and most controlling influences of southern society. I do not mean to say that the republican party may not obtain a footing among the class of people of which I speak. There are many conditions in the South to which the principles of that party and its purposes and its genius have harmonious adaptation. But, sir, if you would lay the foundation of that party there you must lay it broad and deep, broad in its sympathies and deep in the social and political and business life of the people. It cannot be superimposed from without; it cannot come breathing reproach, denunciation, and appeals to the prejudice of one race against the other. In other words, it must desectionalize itself.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says:

> We know, and our opponents know, that if Virginia takes her stand upon that platform the solid South is a thing of the past.

Mr. President, why should the solid South be broken, especially when it is to be done by the great sacrifice of principle which we think this coalition involves? Has not the republican party the possession of all the Departments of the Government and nearly all of the great States of the North? Whence, then, the danger from the solid South? What harm has "the solid South" done to the prosperity and glory of this country? It is but a short time since it became "solid" by the cessation of the reign of force and bayonets. Take her history from that time as connected with this Government, and show me where she has deducted anything from your national security or abstracted a single iota from your national prosperity. She came here through her representatives, first as a part of the minority, and soon afterward as a part of the majority in both branches of Congress. She came at a time when your commerce was languishing, your agriculture prostrate, when mercantile insolvencies and bankruptcies were rushing like a simoon across this nation, when your currency was depreciated, when the balance of trade was against you, and when, according to the statistics of your journals, three millions of tramps were wandering aimless and homeless through the length and breadth of your land. The solid South has been here from that time to this, and during the entire period of the presence of her representatives in this Chamber and in the other House the world has held its breath in silent astonishment at the progress you, the country, has made in all that adorns and fortifies and ennobles a nation. Your commerce has revived, your agriculture is prosperous, your manufactories are operating to the full extent of their capacity, the demand for their products far exceeding their abilities to supply them, your currency is the best in the world, the balance of trade is in your favor, and all along this line of progress we find according to the recent census that the South in every element of prosperity is not far behind the foremost States of the North and West.

Now, sir, I do not pretend that the presence of "the solid South" has caused this marvelous change in your prosperity; I would not presume to say that in the presence of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the late Secretary of the Treasury, who was present in another Department of the Government while "the solid South" was here, during all the progress of this marvelous national transformation; but what I do claim is that the presence of "the solid South" in full force here in the councils of the nation, with her own chosen Senators and Representatives, has not retarded the progress of our common country; has not abstracted from its prosperity. I affirm the progress of this nation in all that constitutes national glory, and prosperity, and honor, and the presence of the solid South in its councils are facts that are co-existent even if they do not sustain to each other the relation of cause and effect. I say that its presence here has been at least no hinderance to the national prosperity, and therefore does not justify the great republican party of this Senate in stepping down from its high pedestal of national honor to take within its embrace this cast-off element of the southern democracy. There is in the existence of the solid South and its presence here no such menace to any interest in this country as can justify or excuse the coalition which is here proposed.

There was a time in the history of this country when "the solid South," that is, "solid" as it is now organized, was not present in the councils of this nation; when the men who are here now were proscribed while reconstruction flourished over them; when the President, the Senate, the Supreme Court, the Federal judiciary, and the State governments were all in the hands of the party represented by the Senators on the other side of this Chamber, and "the solid South" could impress none of its character, none of its influence upon the action of this Goverment or any of its departments; when it was represented alone by the solid North, and by the unscrupulous and irresponsible dependents of the republican party from the South.

Sir, will you have the picture of what this Government was when "the solid South" was not here? I will give it to you, although it was presented to the Senate on yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] A distinguished republican Senator, distinguished for his learning, his juridical ability, his eloquence, his high scholastic attainments, his devotion to the republican party, and his intense, irreconcilable hostility to "the solid South," has painted the picture of the period when this Government was not burdened with the hated presence of this accursed South:

> My own public life has been a very brief and insignificant one, extending little beyond the duration of a single term of senatorial office; but in that brief period I have seen five judges of a high court of the United States driven from office by threats of impeachment for corruption or maladministration.

Since "the solid South" has been here, can you point me to five judges of the Federal courts that have been driven from their high places upon charges of corruption and maladministration?

> I have heard the taunt, from friendliest lips, that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question—

No question about that; the one single thing in which our Government—> surpassed all others beyond question—

At that time when "the solid South" was not here—> was her corruption.

I will read further:

> When the greatest railroad of the world, binding together the continent and uniting the two great seas which wash our shores, was finished, I have seen our national triumph and exultation turned to bitterness and shame by the unanimous reports of three committees of Congress—two of the House and one here—that every step of that mighty enterprise had been taken in fraud.

"The solid South" was not here when that shame fell upon the nation; and it seems to me, sir, that when men with this record fresh in their memories clamor about the dangers and the vices of "the solid South" their cheeks would mantle with shame.

> I have heard in highest places the shameless doctrine avowed by men grown old in public office that the true way by which power should be gained in the Republic is to bribe the people with the offices created for their service, and the true end for which it should be used when gained is the promotion of selfish ambition and the gratification of personal revenge.

Sir, that taunt touches no man on this side of the Chamber.

> I have heard that suspicion haunts the footsteps of the trusted companions of the President.

One thing is certain, sir, that since the solid South has been here no such corruption has reveled in the high places of this Government. I do not say that it was her influence which has eliminated it, but I do say that contemporaneously and simultaneously with her presence here it took its flight; and I claim that she has been no obstacle to the restoration of purity in the administration of your public affairs.

A noted lobbyist is reported to have remarked that "since these infernal democrats had gotten here to Washington the lobbying business had dried up." Said he, "In the name of God, do you expect gentlemen of the lobby to live on oxygen?"

Mr. President, so much has been said about "the solid South," and so much against it as a justification of these extraordinary combinations and affiliations, that I propose to go a little further into the subject. It is charged that by "the solid South's" allying itself with the party that constitutes the minority at the North, it seeks to get possession and control of the Government, and to wield its power for its own selfish purposes. Sir, if the northern people cannot see for themselves the fallacy of this view and the unreality of the danger alleged, no argument that a southern man can advance will avail anything. It is easy to see that if the North chooses to wield this Government through the instrumentality of either political party it can do so and hold "the solid South" in an impotent minority—a minority as impotent in the democratic party as it is in the Government at this time.

The idea that the South under any combination of parties will ever again obtain control of this Government and direct its powers independently of the will of the North is of all ideas the most absurd and chimerical. The North is the majority and the dormant section of this country. The vast preponderance of her population and resources will for an indefinite period control the national policy, whatever party may be in the ascendant. If the majority of the thoughtful people of that section deem a change in the national administration necessary they can make it without any relative change in southern power or influence. Six Northern States alone have a greater electoral vote than all the solid South, and all these States save one have given democratic majorities at different times within the last few years. Should these States for the time being choose to take up the reins of the democracy, all the South united could not impress its distinctive policy, if it had one, upon a democratic caucus.

But, Mr. President, it is not true that there is, as a distinct organization with a distinctive policy, any "solid South" in this Chamber or in the other. There is no such element here as a factor in legislation. You cannot point to any part of the legislation of this country which represents the views or the purpose of southern Senators as a solid body. There is a greater diversity of sentiment among them upon every subject of national interest than there is in the representation of any other section of the country. I could give illustration after illustration. My friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] this day stands in closer affiliation upon the subject of the currency with the Senator from Texas than he does with any of his neighbors across the line of his own State. I could give measure after measure in which it will be shown that the affinities of political affiliation and legislative co-operation are in no sense of the term sectional in this body, and that the southern men exhibit a variety and a diversity and a freedom and an independence in their views and sentiments and actions which are shown among Senators from no other section of the country. There is one point, and one only, upon which they are solid, on which they will remain solid; and neither Federal bayonets nor Federal honors will dissolve that solidity: they are solid in defense of and for the protection of their own civilization, their own society, their own religion; against the rule of the incompetent, the servile, the ignorant, and the vicious.

I will now submit a proposition to the Senators on the other side on this point: I am not going into the history of the causes which led to a solid South, but I here challenge any Senator upon that side, with two exceptions that I will not name, to write fairly in his own language the condition of the southern people in any State while under carpet-bag government; I will consent that he shall write the history of that government; the character of its officials; the nature of its administration and the operation of its laws; I say I will consent for any Senator upon that side of the House, with but two exceptions, (who, out of respect to them, I will not name,) to write the history of the republican government in the South, its nature, its character, its influence upon the happiness and prosperity of that people; I will agree to accept his description of it in his own language; and then I will submit the question to any tribunal in the world, to any community in the world, as to whether there is anywhere on earth a people who ought not to summon every energy, every man, every woman, every child interested in the priceless and precious heritage of humanity, to throw off that government and to keep united and solid to prevent its re-establishment?

I said that I would allow Senators or any northern man to write the history of one of those governments, giving the condition of it, and I would leave him to decide whether it would not justify the consolidation of all the social elements to get rid of it. I will go further, sir, and take it as they have already written it. Here is what one of them said while those governments were reveling in corruption and making the people of the South walk with unsandaled feet over the burning marl of the hell which they had there organized:

> For the last few years the infamy and disgrace of certain Southern State governments have been constantly on the increase. There have been corrupt electors and corrupt elections. There have been corrupt legislators and corrupt legislation. There have been double legislatures, double governors, double representatives in this House, and double Senators year by year in many States. There have been bad men in these States, who have bought power by wholesale bribery, and have enriched themselves at the expense of the people by peculation or open-handed robbery. Corruption and anarchy have occupied and possessed these unfortunate States.

This opinion of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who was then a member of the other House, which does honor to his head as well as to his heart, is the opinion of "the solid South;" and if he were there instead of here he would be a part of that "solid South," arrayed under the determination that anarchy and corruption shall never again occupy and rob those "unfortunate States."

I find that some extracts from other speeches of gentlemen upon the opposite side that I had collected have in some way been disturbed and mislaid. I shall ask permission to incorporate them in my remarks unless I can get them here before I conclude what I have to say upon this subject. Among these is the description of the government of Louisiana under republican rule by the present governor of Ohio, Hon. Charles Foster, and also a gentleman from New Jersey, who has recently been nominated by the President for a distinguished foreign mission, and who by his high and shining qualities will adorn any position to which this Government can assign him. They both describe that government in language stronger and more earnest than that which I have just quoted.

General Grant also, in one of his messages depicting the prostrate condition of the southern people, said he sympathized with them in their prostrate condition, subject as they had been to burdens of taxation without any adequate return. You sent your committees of investigation down there, and while they would hunt up everything that could assail the character and stab the sensibilities of the southern people and pour it out here they could not help stumbling over the corruption, and the atrocity, and the abhorrent infamies of the State governments which they were upholding. I recollect that there was a Senator from Indiana, now dead, who was upon one of these committees. His heart was full of prejudice against our people, but even he could not be blinded to the cruel oppression under which the southern people were writhing in agony. Referring to the condition of the people under those governments, referring to the superincumbent weight of a crushing and devouring taxation, he says:

> That is true of some of these States, I have no doubt. Had the Ku Klux outrages been directed at these faithless public servants the world would have been well rid of them and nobody complained.

Mr. COCKRELL. Who was he?

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Pratt, of Indiana.

Those State governments have gone and the influences have gone with them. The people of those States have recovered their right of self-government. I need not speak of the prosperity of that people, black and white, under their present governments. The census returns have given a result which has astonished the world and which is wholly incompatible with the theory of a down-trodden and oppressed people which the Senator from Massachusetts represented the colored people of the South to be. I will say one thing, and that is, that if you were to compare the condition of the State of Mississippi, or Alabama, or Georgia, or Virginia, or any other Southern State, in 1880, with the statistics and history of its condition as prepared in in 1870, you will be forced to admit there is not a nation on the face of the earth which in any two periods of its history exhibits such a contrast in all that constitutes the strength of a people and their prosperity.

I have here a description of the South as it now is. Here is what a reverend bishop of the Methodist Church, (Bishop Simpson,) closely allied with the republican party, who had made a trip to the South as a part of his episcopal work, said. After traversing that country he returns to the North and reports his impressions, but he says nothing of a kind that sustains the denunciations of the Senator from Massachusetts; he confirms no statement that there are men down there with their feet upon the down-trodden and oppressed; and nobody says so except prejudiced partisans and witnesses brought before committees to make false impressions. Enlightened travelers from Europe and reverend clergymen from the North all contribute their testimony to the peace, the plenty, the order, the quiet, the prosperity of both races, and the security of the personal property of both races, black and white. Here is what that reverend bishop says:

> I am satisfied that the South is gradually but surely improving financially; business is reviving, and every indication points to a period of financial ease and comfort.
> Anti-slavery as I always was from early youth, had my friend asked me twenty years ago to express my utmost wish for the colored people, I should not have dared to ask for such advancement as has been made.

Here is the declaration of an anti-slavery preacher, a utopian, benevolent missionary, whose every fiber was imbued with zeal for the cause of negro emancipation and advancement. Upon his visit to the Southern States, so much denounced, after the solid South has gotten possession of that country, he proclaims to the world that if he had been allowed to tell what he hoped in his brightest vision for that people, it would have been transcended by what has been actually realized in their advancement. Now, withhold your denunciations from the statements of southern men, and let them fall and strike the hallowed associations that cluster around that man.

Mr. President, I am too much exhausted to detain the Senate longer. I have said nothing to-day that was intended to stir up any feeling of animosity between individuals or sections. I belong to that class of public men who were secessionists. Every throb of my heart was for the disunion of these States. If that deducts from the force of the statements I have made to-day it is due to candor and to you to admit it. I confess that I believed in the right of secession and that I believed in the propriety of its exercise. I will say further that it was a cherished conception of my mind, that of two great, free republics on this continent, each pursuing its own destiny and the destiny of its people and their happiness according to its own will.

But, sir, that conception is gone; it is sunk forever out of sight. Another one has come in its place, and by the way it is my first love. The elements of it were planted in my heart by my father; they were taught by my mother, and they were nourished and developed by my own subsequent reflection. May I tell you what it is, sir? It stands before me now, simple in its majesty and sublime in its beauty. It is that of one grand, mighty, indivisible republic upon this continent, throwing its loving arms around all sections; omnipotent for protection, powerless for oppression, cursing none, blessing all! [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Will my colleague yield a moment for me to make a motion?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I move, Mr. President, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Massachusetts moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FARLEY. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, Sir Walter Scott, in one of his best novels, describes a young Scotch lord in the reign of Charles I who falls into the temptations of the city of London, and is taken into the presence of the king. He is lectured by the Duke of Buckingham, who once when reproached by the king as being the most profligate man in his dominions, replied, "Of a subject, sire, perhaps I am." He was also lectured on some of his sins by Prince Charles, the most noted man perhaps in England in his day for dissimulation. The delighted old king says, "Oh! it would have done ye good to have heard Steenie lecture him on the sin of incontinence and Baby Charles holding forth on the evil of dissimulation." I confess I was reminded of that incident when I heard the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] eloquently reproach the republican party of the Senate with an alliance with persons tainted with the heresy of repudiation. The Senator says he has said nothing which is calculated to excite any feeling in our breasts, to stir up anything of sectional or of personal resentment. Does the Senator really think that to tell us that we are allying ourselves with the dregs of the South, (which was one of his phrases,) that we are taking the cast-off and obscene doctrine of repudiation, is a thing not calculated to excite any resentment in the breasts of those to whom it is applied? I should like to read a sentence from that most accomplished historian of American finance, Mr. Porter, now the authority in the Census Office on this subject, and it is this:

The early repudiation of Mississippi, as described in the account of State indebtedness in 1841, so greatly injured the credit of the State that since that time it has been debarred from the luxury of going into debt. With accrued interest that debt now amounts to about $23,000,000. The total recognized debt of the State, however, is $379,485.

* * * * * * * *

Until this time—

I take another passage going back now to the history of 1841—

the word "repudiation" had not entered into the financial history of American States—

That word to which the Senator has applied so many unsavory adjectives—

The word originated in the State of Mississippi, and was ushered into existence by Governor McNut, of that State, in January, 1841, in a message suggesting the plan of "repudiating the sale of certain of the State bonds on account of fraud and illegality."

Now, that full justice may be done, I ask the Clerk to read from the five hundred and fifty-ninth page and the five hundred and sixtieth page of this book as far as marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It may be interesting at this time briefly to refer to the facts which induced Mississippi to take this action upon the subject of its debt. In 1838 the State chartered the Mississippi Union Bank, and, in order to provide capital for the institution, it was enacted in the charter that the directors should borrow $15,500,000 and that the governor might issue 7,500 bonds for $2,000 each, bearing 5 per cent. interest and redeemable in twelve, eighteen, and twenty years, and deliver them to the officers of that institution from time to time in proportion to the amounts subscribed for bank stock, the price of which was to be secured to the satisfaction of the directors. The bonds were made negotiable for the expenses of the president and cashier of the bank; the governor, by an additional act, was authorized to subscribe in behalf of the State for $5,000,000 of the stock of the bank, and he did so. In June, 1838, he delivered to the bank 2,500 bonds, amounting to $5,000,000, payable in twelve and twenty years from the 5th day of February, 1838, and bearing 5 per cent. interest from their date. The charter required the bank to appoint three commissioners for the sale of the bonds, and imposed this restriction on their authority—that the bonds should not be sold under their par value. On the 18th of August, 1838, the commissioners sold all the bonds to Mr. Biddle for the sum of $5,000,000, payable in five equal installments of $1,000,000 each on the 1st day of November, 1838, and the 1st days of January, March, May, and July, 1839, without interest. This money was punctually paid to the bank, which went into operation, and before January, 1841, lost all its capital. In commenting on this, Judge Curtis, in his essay on State debts, heretofore referred to, says:

"Now, we feel constrained to say that if this matter had rested here the State of Mississippi would not be legally bound to pay this debt. We think the commissioners did not conform to their authority in making the sale; they were in terms prohibited from selling the bonds under their par value. The par value of a bond is the amount which is due upon it, and this includes interest as well as principal. This seems to be to us the plain meaning of the charter, and any other construction would render the restriction itself nugatory, since by allowing the interest to accumulate long enough the commissioners would have had it in their power to obtain $5,000,000 for the bonds, though at the very moment when they sold them $7,000,000 might be due upon them. They made such a sale as not to receive in cash the amount equal to the liability of the State on the bonds, and therefore we believe that they exceeded their authority."

It must be acknowledged that the State had the legal right to insist, at a proper time, on this want of authority even against the subsequent purchasers of these bonds, because any one who takes a title through an agent is bound by law to look to the authority delegated to him, and to see that he acts or has acted within its scope in making the title. In response to the message of the governor in January, 1841, the Legislature of the State of Mississippi passed a resolution to the effect that the State was bound to the holders of the bonds of the State sold on account of the bank, for the amount of the principal and the interest; and, furthermore, that the State of Mississippi would pay her bonds and preserve her faith inviolate. The Legislature at this time repudiated with great vigor the insinuation that the State of Mississippi would repudiate her bonds and violate her plighted faith; and, moreover, declared that any accusation of this kind was a "calumny upon the justice, honor, and dignity of the State." Having thus acknowledged the validity of the debt, and pledged her word for its redemption, all further discussion as to its legality ended. These bonds were never formally repudiated, but fell into default; and, although successive governors urged payment, no provision was made, and in 1852 the appropriation therefor was defeated by 4,400 majority on a popular vote. There is a proposition now before the Legislature of Mississippi for a compromise with the holders of the old repudiated bonds of that State. This proposition from the English bondholders, received after adjournment of the last Legislature, and consequently a year old, is for a waiver of all consideration for interest since 1840, and a reissue of the $7,000,000 to begin at 3 per cent., and increase annually at the rate of one-half per cent., giving the State the option of receiving the bonds for any unoccupied State lands, at three hundred and twenty acres for a thousand-dollar bond, that immigration of workers may be induced. The proposition, says the published report, was received politely, and action was taken looking to a joint committee for its consideration; but, if correctly reported, its terms are obviously impracticable, being penal in severity; hence its acceptance must be deemed hopeless.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I want the Senator from Mississippi now to understand that I do not cause that piece of history to be read for the sake of reviving any ancient history which had better be forgotten; but when the Senator stands up and taunts my associates on this floor with an alliance with what he is pleased to call the discarded dregs of southern democracy and with the odious doctrine of repudiation, I desire to have him, if he addresses the Senate again hereafter, to reply if he is willing to adhere on reflection to the statements of his speech, if he is willing to say that he himself has acted upon the theory that he will associate with no person in politics who has been in favor of the repudiation of a State debt. The State of Mississippi in 1843, there being a fair and honest original question about the validity of her bonds, proceeded to declare that the faith of that State was solemnly pledged to their redemption, and thereupon, upon the face of that utterance of a democratic Legislature, those bonds went into the markets of the world. The late illustrious citizen of Massachusetts, George Peabody, left $3,000,000 of those bonds to a fund which he established as a benefaction of the States of the South; and yet the State of Mississippi, the democratic State of Mississippi, by the lips of its Senator preaches us a sermon, not on the sin of repudiating our debts ourselves, but because we do not gather up the skirts of our garments and walk carefully and circumspectly through the world lest by chance they shall somewhere brush against the frieze coat of a southern repudiator.

Why, with whom are we to ally ourselves? We cannot have a solid North; that is unpatriotic in the eyes of the honorable Senator. We cannot ally ourselves with the negroes of the South properly, or with the carpet-baggers, and we cannot ally ourselves with anybody who is willing to pay any part of your southern debt if he does not pay the whole; but we must turn to that remarkably honest and consistent portion of the southern democracy which in Virginia votes to pay all its debt and refuses for eight years to raise a tax even to pay the interest, and with the other portion of the State-debt payers of the South who, represented in Mississippi, owing a debt of $23,000,000, declare that there is about $329,000 of it that they are willing to pay.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Mississippi did me the honor to have read, not for the first time in this debate, an extract from some remarks of mine made to the Senate as a court of impeachment in this body. I am prepared to stand by, and if the occasion come, to reaffirm every utterance of that speech. It has been read twice. The Senator shall have my full consent now to have it passed, to be enacted. That speech was addressed by a republican to a republican Senate. It was after the great war. Long before the war ended we were admonished by all the lessons of history of like periods that corruption and looseness in public expenditure would be likely to prevail even under the best government at its close. I knew nothing of politics, and the republican party knew nothing of politics, when it brought these things into the light and suppressed and in most cases punished the actors. Will the Senator from Mississippi say the same, that he has known nothing of political considerations in screening misdoers, committers of any kind of crime against a State? When he did me the honor to read that extract from my speech he skipped and left out the sentence which applied to the Tweed government of the city of New York and to the four or five democratic judges who were impeached for corruption in that State. The difference between him and me is that such an offense against the body politic, by whomsoever committed, is in my eyes a thing only to be denounced and brought to punishment without distinction of party, but in his a thing simply to make a point against his political opponents and to be screened and covered up when a democratic wrongdoer is under consideration.

The honorable Senator was pleased also, imputing to me some personal accomplishments which I do not in the least profess, to make another imputation which I take leave to tell him I still less deserve, and that is a bitterness of hatred, of prejudice toward the people of the South. Mr. President, I deny it. Humble as my political life may be, I am willing to place it in comparison even with his, distinguished and illustrious as his attainments in regard to a true love or a true service to that people. I have sought by my votes to help if I could to strike from the necks of five or six million of its people the yoke which he would have retained. I introduced in the other House and carried through a proposition to give to the people of the South for their common schools substantially the whole proceeds of the public lands. I introduced into this body a proposition to give them not only that, but also to give them the entire proceeds of the patents paid for by the inventors of this country, of whom a thousand dwell in the State of Massachusetts where but one exists in the State of Mississippi.

The gentleman who carried through that magnificent triumph of modern science and engineering skill which has opened the mouth of the Mississippi and made one long seaport of the river bank of his State, diverting the trade of the Northwest from the commercial cities of Boston and New York, the former of which I immediately represent, and carry it around through the mouth of the Mississippi, left the committee-room in the House of Representatives, and disappointed and almost broken-hearted, with an unfavorable report. I called him back myself, I sat down with him and went over step by step the details of his bill. I went back with him to the committee; I moved a reconsideration, and by my casting vote the bill under which that vast public work was adopted received a favorable report, and I have Captain Eads's written acknowledgment to the fact that the success of that mighty enterprise is due to that political action of mine.

Mr. President, I am ashamed to stand up in the presence of the United States Senate and undertake to discuss my own poor and insignificant public services with anything that shall seem like a boast; but it is no trifle. It is not I; it is the representation of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts which is charged with hatred of the people, what he calls his people, at the South; in whose name it is my right and my duty to spurn the insinuation. There is one heart's desire in the breasts of the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—and when I say that I know I could say the same for the other great States of the East if it were becoming in me to speak of New York and Connecticut and of the Northwest—and that is to have a free, prosperous, rich, contented, and happy South. To accomplish that we, if need be, would shut up our factories; we would let the grass grow in the streets of our commercial cities; we would let poverty haunt our counting-rooms and the palaces of our merchants. Show us a single practical measure which will help you in regard to which we are to pay taxes and you are to receive the benefits, and then I challenge you to show us the northern vote which will be lacking when the yeas and nays are called.

It is not the South, it is tyranny; it is not the South, it is fraud and assassination; it is not the South, it is the Bourbon democracy, with its spirit of rebellion, of hate, of assassination, of cheating, that we hate, and against which, gentlemen, you must understand our undying warfare is to be waged. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order!

Mr. HOAR. Why, Mr. President, every utterance, every unconscious utterance that falls from the lips of the honorable Senator from Mississippi shows that he has learned nothing within the last twenty years. He speaks constantly of the South; he personifies it; he says the South, "she," desires this or has done that or the other. When he speaks he speaks of "my people" and "that people," as if this country were divided into two peoples, hostile or friendly as the case may be.

Mr. President, there is no such thing under the Constitution of the United States as "the South." There is no relation which exists between the State of Kentucky and the State of South Carolina which does not exist between the State of Massachusetts and the State of Louisiana. We are one people, and not two. When the Senator avows his purpose to keep alive what he calls "the solid South," and defends it as he has defended it here, he stands upon the same doctrine which has cost this country four years of civil war and four thousand millions of treasure and a million of human lives. When every Senator can stand up in his place as the honorable Senator from Virginia stood in his to say that he lives in a nation and not in an aggregation of petty provinces any longer; when he can speak of the whole country as "my people;" when he can speak of America without regard to section or to parallels of latitude or points of the compass as his country and his people, then the new era will have come; but until then the old spirit will be here and the old warfare will be going on.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. LAMAR. Will the Senator permit me a word? Having been compelled to cut short one speech on account of sheer exhaustion, I shall be unable to make another in reply to the remarks just submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] There is not a single one of them which does not contain a fallacy easily exposed, and I may, if I deem it necessary, take another occasion to do it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, nothing has been left by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] unsaid in proper reply to the matter which has been submitted to the Senate by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] and I do not rise in any presumptuous hope on my part that I can contribute by a proper presentation of the truth of history to the peace of the moving power of the Senate, and I trust it will pardon me for a few words before this remarkable lecture shall have passed out of mind.

The Senator from Mississippi did the honor to pay much personal attention to myself and to hold up to the Senate, with running comments of his own, a colloquy which happened between myself and the Senator from Virginia on the left, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] for what purpose he failed to avow himself, but with this result, I am glad to know, of bringing out more clearly than I succeeded myself—but which I did not apprehend there was any necessity for doing, because no doubt ever pertained to my own convictions upon that point—the fact that notwithstanding I had seen fit to propose as a proper candidate for an office of this Senate a man who entertained the views he did upon the question of the local debt of Virginia, I still adhered unequivocally and without compromise to the position I had ever held, that he who will repudiate his own obligation forfeits in that respect the confidence of those with whom I act. No other result came from that commentary upon the conversation between the Senator from Virginia and myself than that. I stand, so far as he has reproduced the record, where he knew I stood, and where during his commentaries he admitted that I stood, condemning repudiation wherever it may be. The Senator omitted to carry the quotation from what I said in those remarks far enough to have the Senate understand that he saw himself the reasons I had avowed here upon this floor for supporting for this office a man with whom I did not agree in the matter to which he alludes.

I do not care to repeat what I have said. I have a constituency that does not need the constant avowal upon my part of my opinion upon these questions, and I leave that to him to explain if he thinks it worth while. For what purpose he reproduced this colloquy with the Senator from Virginia, which brought the Senator out from his own party, standing out alone, confessing his inability to find a single associate even in Virginia with him to avow the doctrine which I said at that time did him so much honor, I do not know.

But the Senator from Mississippi went further in the attention which he paid to me. He assured the Senate that he knew better the people of the North than her own Senators, and that they would listen to him and not to us. Sir, I do not assume to know much about the people of Massachusetts to whom he has devoted these remarks; but the people of Massachusetts know her Senators, and they are quite willing to leave the question whether they fairly represent the public sentiment of Massachusetts just where Massachusetts herself chooses to leave it; but I want to assure the Senator from Mississippi in all kindness that whatever may have been the time when he had the ear of Massachusetts, that time, I am sorry to say, has passed away.

The Senator knows full well when he came back to these Halls, after having spent four years in a vain effort to destroy the existence of this nation, who first took him by the hand, who first led him into the House of Representatives upon his proclamation that was heard in Massachusetts, because it was repeated by one of the Representatives from Massachusetts, that he had come back to abjure all that he had done and had attempted to do in those four years; that he had come back to try to do something for his people, as he then called them, poor, dispirited, disorganized, broken-down, and to try to reconcile that people to that new order of things which had come out of his own failure in those four years. He knows that when that statement was repeated the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, accompanied by applause upon the floor, rehabilitated and put him upon his feet—a citizen of the United States. He knows, too, who got him an opportunity to tell the people of Massachusetts, "When you know us more you will love us better," and they listened to him then. I have no disposition to question the sincerity of that Senator; but the people of Massachusetts turned to look toward Mississippi to see the fruit that was to come from all these professions; they sought to know the people of Mississippi better, and they took their capital, and they took their energy, and they took their enterprise, and they took their convictions, and they went down to Mississippi, expecting, confiding in what the Senator had told them, that they were but to know them more that they might thereby love them better.

Now, sir, I tell the Senator from Mississippi that the reason he is mistaken when he tells this Senate that the people of Massachusetts and the North will listen to him to-day is because they have found no work in Mississippi meet for repentance. Others have gone before him, not a week almost, not certainly a month, but orators come from Mississippi North; and the Senator, as I tell him in all kindness, lost the ear of the North. Only the day before yesterday there passed through this city on his way to the North, in which he could enjoy his own convictions, a venerable gray-headed man, who, trusting to these words that he had but to know the people of Mississippi better in order to love them more, took his capital, took his wife and his children, and his energy and his hope and his future thirteen years ago, down into the Senator's State to build up a home, to build up a business, and enlarge the opportunities of men in that State to earn a livelihood and to better their condition and to build for themselves homes and school-houses and churches and towns; and faithfully and industriously and devoted exclusively to such a great undertaking as that, that old gray-headed man has labored and labored on, hoped on and hoped on, but he was persecuted until he was obliged to put iron shutters on the windows of the houses of his workmen that they might sleep in safety at night, his factories were burned, his employés were murdered, his enterprises were thwarted at every step; not even exercising what we at the North have a notion is an inalienable right, to assert our political principles wherever we are; not even doing that, never having entered a political meeting or cast a vote, but sternly standing by the faith of his fathers, which sooner than give up he would burn at the stake, he resolved that he would give up no conviction of his, political or otherwise, and in this struggle he has at last given over, and taking what little is left of that hopeless enterprise of his, and leaving three or four hundred men with their families whom he had employed these thirteen years to seek a livelihood elsewhere, or migrate to your State, sir, [Mr. INGALLS in the chair,] or to the State of the Senator from Indiana, or some other place; he has gone North and the North will listen to him before they will ask the Senator from Mississippi to repeat again here his platitudes about North and South. Sir, this is not the only orator that comes North.

Mr. GEORGE. May I interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts in order to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know the name of the gentleman to whom the Senator has alluded. I have never heard of such an instance in Mississippi. I have never heard of anybody's factory being burned or anybody's operatives being shot at or murdered in any way. I suppose the Senator will have no objection to disclosing the name of this person. Tell me who he was, where he came from, what county he lived in, and when all this happened. I should like to know all about the circumstance. It is all news to us.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has just attained a position to be a good lecturer to go North——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not propose——

Mr. DAWES. Living in the State of Mississippi, from which every breeze comes laden——

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator, respectfully, to answer the question which I propounded to him. I undertake to say that——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator had better say it in his own time.

Mr. GEORGE. The circumstances which have been recited by the Senator are untrue.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will excuse me now. The Senator has put a question to me. I do not propose to let it go by.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. DAWES. I say that the Senator stands well by the side of his colleague as a fit man to go North and ask them to listen to the further assurance that we have only to know his people, as he calls them, in order to love them better. The people of the North will know that man when he goes there, and the people of the North know that when he went down to Mississippi he was as true and noble a citizen of my own Commonwealth as lives there or lives in any other State; and they will believe every word he says. I say to the Senator from Mississippi that it is the old way of meeting this thing to call for names. I can give the Senator names, but I do not intend to furnish any opportunity for further persecution and further destruction of property and visitation upon those connected with this man in his vain effort, not by the Senator, I do not mean that, but by the evidence which he hopes to draw out from me here upon this floor to be used by others.

I was about to say that this was but a single one of many instances occurring every year and many times a year, of men who, supposing that if the people of Mississippi had learned anything from the war, if her leading men had gone home among them and taught them that the war had settled anything, it was that a man who is an American citizen, whoever he may be, if he were born on our soil and beneath our flag, being an American citizen with the flag above him and the Constitution around him, he had the constitutional right, settled at Appomattox Court House forever, to enjoy in Mississippi every privilege and every immunity he could enjoy in Massachusetts; men who had in full faith gone down there, carrying their capital and carrying their energy, carrying their future, to identify themselves with that people, supposing also that they had a right to carry their principles, who are coming back. They are preachers, and the North is listening to them.

That is why I say in all kindness to the senior Senator from Mississippi that he is mistaken. There was a time when the North listened to him. There was a time when they gladly welcomed him to public life again, when they bade us listen to and confide in him, and we did. He has no right to complain of any Senator in the North for any personal lack of that confidence. He knows what I mean, and he knows whether they have endeavored in vain to satisfy their people, the people among whom they lived and who are their constituents, that out of it would come a safer and better order of things, in which men could entertain whatever convictions they pleased and utter them with impunity at the South and in Mississippi as they can in Massachusetts, on any platform and on every platform; that they could walk up to the polls as they can in Massachusetts, and he who puts a straw across the path of the humblest voter in Massachusetts will have the whole power of her judicial and her executive officers visited upon him to the utmost. They carried that idea down into Mississippi. The people of the North hear every day of the lives which have been lost in the vain attempt to do there what they have a right to do in my State.

I had put in my hand yesterday that voting ticket, [exhibiting,] two thousand of which have been by official authority in the State that the Senator represents thrown out of the count just because of that little dash under the words "National Republican Ticket," and a man who was entitled to his seat in the other branch by more than 5,000 votes if they had been honestly counted loses his certificate because nobody having the authority in his hands seemed to think in that State that the voice of the voter is paramount and supreme.

The people of Massachusetts know that. The people of Massachusetts know, too, that while the Senator was proclaiming in the other House the anxiety of Mississippi that we should know her better in order that we might love her more, she was deposing her governor, an honest, high-minded, educated officer of the Army of the United States, and was boldly saying to him, "Here are articles of impeachment in this hand, and there is a majority of the Senate to pass upon them. Give us your resignation in this hand, and we will never say a word. We are after your office; we do not care for you. Leave that office and go to that North"—to which the Senator turns now in the pretense that they listen to him—"and you have committed no offense against the laws of Mississippi that that going to the North will not condone."

Sir, I did not intend to indulge in this debate, and I should not if I had not felt a little moved when the Senator from Mississippi turned and politely informed me that he knew more about my constituents than I did myself. Sometimes I wish I did not know quite so much about the operations in Mississippi as I do. I have heard of the shoestring district. I have told you how an honest, able, and clear-headed debater, who has few equals, was counted out by two thousand in the way I have stated. I have read the testimony of 1875 regarding that State. I have been told who was chairman of the democratic State committee under whose auspices that revolution was worked. I know that a State with fifteen or twenty thousand republican majority, under that political administration of 1875 and that which goes by the name of "the Mississippi plan" down there, was silenced, extinguished, exterminated, and the heroes who laid down their lives in the vain struggle in that State to maintain the right of the poor man to vote as he pleased, are sleeping an eternal sleep.

Does the Senator from Mississippi think that with all this before them my constituents will listen to him? I give myself no uneasiness on that score. I have nothing to blame myself for in the humble part I took in trying to bring the Senator from Mississippi in closer connection and communion with the people of the North, trusting that he was engaged, (and I do not doubt his sincerity,) as he professed to say he was, in an effort to secure to the poor and humble man who had been a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] so well said, for these many years, to him and his—in the praiseworthy effort to put him upon his feet, clothe him, gird his loins, educate him, and put in his hand that highest signet of an American citizen, a free and an honest ballot, and in that effort to impress upon the people of the North that some good like that was to come out of the efforts of the Senator from Mississippi.

I hear that at Oxford, Mississippi, (perhaps the Senator knows where that is,) at the last election cannon were trained upon timid and affrighted voters, and discharged during the day; that the noise and the terror of those arms might have, I suppose, what in Mississippi and according to "the Mississippi plan" would be called a legitimate effect upon voters.

Sir, I know that men have fallen who have dared to be candidates for office outside of the organization that tolerates these things. I know, and the people of the North know, too, that whatever else may be in store for them in this conflict, they are no longer to be deluded by fair words and unfounded pretensions. The reality, the fact, the experience of those who come back from there are arguments of more force, carrying more conviction to the northern mind, than all the rhetoric and all the eloquence that has nothing behind it but fair and eloquent words.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I had no thought whatever of occupying any of the time of the Senate at this session, but I have been brought to unwilling feet by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who has quoted certain remarks that fell from me in an old debate at the other end of the Capitol eight or nine years ago, in which remarks of mine I took occasion, perhaps in rather unsparing terms, to denounce certain carpet-bag governments in the Southern States. I spoke, it may be, then in somewhat ardent fashion, but I had reason to believe then, and I do not deny now, that what I said had ground for the statements made.

That is by no means the question to-day. That was, as I have said, eight or nine years ago. There have been since that time yearly elections and presidential elections in all the South. I ask the Senator from Mississippi what his people, as he chooses to call them, or what his party has done in what we believe to be a legitimate way to relieve the Southern States of whatever evils they labored under? There has been ample opportunity. There is no doubt but that at the time those States suffered evil. There has never been a time in the history of any people after great military convulsions and the disturbing and uprooting of governments when there has not been a following era of laxity of loose reins. The primal duty laid upon any people is to struggle faithfully by legitimate methods to remove such evils. I ask the Senator, I ask the Senate, what the southern democracy has done in the way of relieving the Southern States from the evils of the early carpet-bag rule?

There is one way of doing it in which we believe; there is another way of doing it in which he and his party at the South evidently believe. The way that we believe in is a patient endurance in an appeal to the power of the majority and relief by silent processes under the law. The way that he and his party believe in is the brutal way, is assassination, is the dominancy of the minority, is putting the majority under foot by violent methods.

"The Mississippi plan," as it has been characterized, and as all the world understands it, furnishes the reason why the whole country has lately voted its want of confidence in the democratic party led and controlled by the southern end of it. It is not that anybody stands to apologize for what may have been the excesses of early carpet-bag governments, but because the southern democracy has shown itself profoundly incapable of appreciating the proper method of relief.

I have seen, sir, in my own State not very long ago a people greatly provoked and exasperated, and I saw the relief by silent, peaceful methods. I saw three years ago the party of the Senator from Mississippi allying itself with a new organization and by the popular vote securing the control in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. When a year afterward the voice of the people asserted itself again and the fusion of greenbackers and democrats were left in a minority, its government there set up by the democratic party and its allies held on or attempted to hold on to the government by a species of fraud such as gentlemen at the South have never seen and can have never known.

I saw the whole people aroused, exasperated to a degree where a single inflammatory word, it seemed, would precipitate the State into a revolution of terror and blood. But the republican party of the State of Maine, the republican party of the nation, believes in no such methods, and suffering and enduring, and invoking the law, and resting upon the will of a majority of the people, the State of Maine brought itself out and relieved itself of its perils. We did not believe then in the methods of the southern democracy, the methods of the parishes of Conshatta, of Ouachita, and of the Felicianas. We did not believe in the methods of Kemper County nor in the tissue ballots of South Carolina, but we believed in the peaceful process of law and the sublime assertion of the will of the majority.

If the gentleman and his party and his people had shown themselves capable of that profound endurance and had resorted simply to the rights that any people aggrieved may have by an appeal to the majority, his party to-day would have stood far different in the nation from what it does now. It is not a question of apology for the carpet-bag governments of the early days after the rebellion, but of the methods of the southern democracy in their management of politics.

Before I sit down I may say that we stand to-day confronted with an exemplification of this proposition. The gentleman and his associates are alarmed at the present condition, and are holding us here day by day, not, I am bound to say, because they are possessed with the desire of retaining a few petty offices that surround this Hall—that is not it—but a deep alarm possesses them because in one State in the South our method of appealing to the majority of the people has been tried, and not their method.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] has led in that great movement. I for one have no apology or hesitation or sensitiveness about the situation in standing by him. Many a man in the last eight years has sat by the ear of the Executive or has in private conversation avowed that he was tired of the methods of the Senator from Mississippi and his friends, and that the day had come when he would have no more part or parcel in them. But those utterances have never gone further. There had never been a day when any gentleman has dared, as the Senator from Virginia has dared, to come out and put his convictions into action and to stand and give and take blows for his belief. He is the first who dared not only to avow his dissatisfaction with these methods of the southern democracy, but to manfully battle with them, and put his fate, his fortune, and may be his life into the great struggle. We welcome him; and it is because of the alarm that the gentlemen on the other side feel at this experiment of our method being tried in Virginia that they are seeking to thwart what they call a corrupt alliance. I fully believe that the Senator from Virginia is earnest and sincere in his warfare in favor, as he calls it, of a free and priceless ballot. I know that the republican party is dedicated to the great mission of seeing that that be established. I know that it welcomes adherents and cohorts everywhere.

I do not know what may happen in this Administration, but I do hope and believe that in welcoming him in his work and in helping to sustain it we will find that at last there is an administration of the Government of this country under which if a single voter, anywhere, who is entitled by the law and the Constitution to vote on national questions is molested in the exercise of that right the whole power of a government of 50,000,000 people will be invoked to protect him. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I had hoped that it would not have been necessary for me at this session of the Senate to occupy any of the attention of this body in discussing any of the various subjects which have been introduced here. I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate now did I not feel compelled to notice some of the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in reference to my own State. He communicated to the Senate and to the country some information in relation to a gentleman who many years ago—fifteen, I believe—is said to have gone to the State of Mississippi, to have carried his money there, to have built a factory there, to have employed factory hands, and after having lived there for that length of time he was here in Washington yesterday on his way back to Massachusetts, giving the information that his factory had been burned and that his hands had been murdered. I asked the Senator politely, and because I wanted information, the name of that gentleman, the locality of the factory, the time when and the place where these extraordinary things had occurred. The Senator declined to give these particulars to me.

Although the Senator from Massachusetts may have met the individual he alluded to and may have received from him the information which he detailed to the Senate, I undertake to say from a somewhat extended knowledge of the people of Mississippi that the whole thing is an unfounded myth. I have never heard of a factory in Mississippi having been burned. We have but two or three in the State, and certainly if one of them had been burned it could not have escaped my attention. I have never heard of any man's factory hands having been interfered with, much less murdered, and I am bound to believe that there is not a single particle of truth in the relation which the Senator received from his informant. I undertake to say that no such man has lived in Mississippi, and that no such factory has been built in Mississippi or has been burned in Mississippi.

When the Senator here in the presence of the American Senate and in the presence of the American people undertook to blacken the fair fame and name of the people of one of the States of this Union by retailing what I say is an atrocious calumny, and when a representative of that people asked him politely for the purpose of enabling him to vindicate their character for the name of his informant and for the locality of the atrocities which he had related, would it not have been fair for him to have communicated it? How are we to defend ourselves against invisible and nameless slanderers; how are we to refute charges of arson and murder, when neither the locality of the burning is given nor the names of those murdered nor the locality of the murderers? I undertake here to make the statement that there is not a single particle of foundation in truth for the charge which the gentleman has made before the Senate. I do not mean to say that the Senator did not get the information from the gentleman he says he got it from, but I do mean to say that there is not the slightest foundation for it; and I defy the Senator and I defy his informant to the proof of the charge.

This is a very singular way to blacken the reputation of a whole people. We have here, indorsed by an American Senator of great character and representing a great and enlightened Commonwealth, a nameless slanderer assumed or represented to be in his flight from Mississippi to Massachusetts; we have the statement of that person, indorsed thus respectably, thrown before the American people. When we ask for some of the indicia, some of the circumstances which will enable us to refute the charge, the Senator declines to give them, and upon what ground? As I understood the Senator, upon the ground that he would not expose his informant, now in Massachusetts, to the personal violence which would ensue from a disclosure of his name in Mississippi; that he would not expose his property in Mississippi to further depredation.

Mr. President, that will not do. If the people of Mississippi are already mean enough to burn that man's factory and murder his hands, certainly they do not need the stimulus of the disclosure of his name for a further trespass upon his rights. I say, therefore, that that cannot be a good reason for it. If he lived in a community whose feelings he had so outraged and into whose enmities he had so entered that they had burned his house and murdered his hands, could he fear any greater injury by a disclosure of his name? What possible personal danger could he be in, in Massachusetts, from the people of Mississippi? No, sir; that is not a sufficient reason for a failure to disclose the name.

We have suffered in the South a great deal from these nameless slanderers, always concealing their names upon the plea that if their names were disclosed somebody would hurt them. I supposed that sort of tactics would not meet the approbation of an American Senator.

Something was said about "the Mississippi plan," and I believe, although my name was not mentioned, I was alluded to as the chairman of the committee of the democratic party in 1875, when this plan is supposed to have been inaugurated. I do not propose to go into a discussion of what occurred in 1875. I mean to say, however, that every telegram that I sent when I was chairman of that committee was taken from the telegraph office by the committee of investigation sent there from this body, two of the members of it being now here, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] and but one of the whole number, there being several hundred, was found to be worthy of objection and criticism, and that was written at the dictation and request of the representative of the United States Government then in Mississippi, G. K. Chase.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman state what that telegram was?

Mr. GEORGE. It was a telegram sent at his request to some friends of mine in a distant county to interpose to prevent some carpet-bagger from being hurt.

Mr. HOAR. Was it not to prevent his being murdered?

Mr. GEORGE. Being hurt; I do not know whether murdered or not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator will permit me; may I not recall to his attention the facts of that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi consent to be interrupted?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. General Warner, residing at some distance from Jackson, was in the city of Jackson upon election day, and about to return to his home for the purpose of casting his vote upon that election day. The officer of the United States to whom the Senator referred and very many others were satisfied and believed that if General Warner went to his home from Jackson for the purpose of voting he would lose his life. They applied to the Senator from Mississippi, who was then chairman of the State central democratic committee, and requested him to telegraph to his political friends at General Warner's home to protect him in his right to vote. In pursuance of that request the Senator from Mississippi telegraphed to the home of General Warner, to persons who were the political friends of the Senator and in charge of the polls there, that no harm must come to General Warner if he attempted to exercise the right of suffrage that day.

Mr. HOAR. What was the reply?

Mr. MCMILLAN. In the evening a reply was received by telegraph from the person to whom the Senator had telegraphed in these words: "Your telegram saved Warner." Those, I believe, are the facts.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, I know a little more about that than the Senator does. He is very nearly correct in the relation that he has made of that transaction; but he does not know the fact which I now disclose here, and which is well known in Mississippi and well known to Mr. Chase, that when he applied to me to send that telegram expressing fears for the safety of Warner, I informed him distinctly that Warner was in no danger whatever and that a telegram was wholly unnecessary. He told me that he had information to the contrary. I said to him that I did not believe in his information. He then said: "As a personal favor to me, send a telegram." I wrote it at his dictation, used the language he wanted me to use, telling him at the same time that it was wholly unnecessary. And as to the response to which the Senator alludes, I have the authority of the gentleman whose name was signed to it and whom I did not know at that time, to say that his signature to that dispatch was a forgery. So now it appears that the whole "head and front of my offending" as chairman of the democratic committee of 1875 was that at the bidding and at the dictation of a Federal officer, against my own judgment and thoroughly convinced, as I was and as I expressed to him, that the action was unnecessary, in the goodness of my heart and in the disposition to accommodate those who applied to me, I sent a request which was wholly unnecessary, and a response was sent to it which turned out to be a forgery.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will certainly concede that there was no such allegation at that time as that the reply was a forgery.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I did not learn that until afterward myself.

Mr. McMILLAN. And that General Warner was the chairman of the republican State central committee at that time.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not remember whether he was the chairman or not; but I will state this for the information of the Senator, that the only complaint I have ever heard by the republicans at Jackson, Mississippi, where I reside, and near which General Warner resides, about my conduct in that campaign, was that, supposing, as the Senator from Minnesota supposes, that my telegram saved Warner, the complaint was that I did not allow him to be killed. That is the complaint made by republicans.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not intend to enter into any discussion of the conduct of that campaign at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is desired by the Senator whom I know very well and respect very highly, and if he will come to me, I will tell him the names of the republicans who so expressed themselves.

Into that, Mr. President, I will go no further except to say this: I would like to warn the Senator from Massachusetts, I would like to warn the Senators on the other side, and if my voice could be heard or my words read by the northern people, I would like to warn them against placing credence in the stories that they hear about Mississippi. They had a witness here last year who testified about Mississippi affairs, a gentleman whom I never met, named Kennedy, who resides in the town in which my colleague lives. He testified before some committee here, not twelve months ago, that I regularly issued my orders while I was chairman of the democratic committee in 1875 to the various counties in the State, and had just so many republicans killed as was necessary to carry the election!

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a fact?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not desirous at present of going into any discussion about the conduct of that Mississippi campaign.

Mr. GEORGE. Nor am I either.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not desire to charge upon the Senator from Mississippi any responsibility in regard to it, but I can call the attention of the Senator to one instance that occurred there of a very terrible murder, and that was of Mr. Hathaway, who was murdered in his house at night, shot in the presence of his wife and family, by masked men who came to his house at midnight. The fact was not disputed; no evidence whatever was offered to contradict the fact; and it occurred just after the breaking out of the riots, you well remember. I refer to Hathaway who had gone from Massachusetts to reside in Mississippi, and had resided there for some years. That is only one instance out of the very many that I could recall.

Mr. GEORGE. If I ever heard of that before, I have forgotten it. Suppose there was one murder; and I believe murders occur every week in every State possibly in the Union——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator if the Chisholm murder is a slander on the State that we hear about?

Mr. GEORGE. I will tell you that had nothing to do with politics; it was a private quarrel.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I can remind the Senator of certain incidents that occurred in Mississippi in 1875, which I think he will not have forgotten.

Mr. GEORGE. Well.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I presume he heard of the so-called riots, otherwise called massacre, at Clinton. I doubt if he has forgotten that.

Mr. GEORGE. I know all about that. Do you want me to tell you what I know about it?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Well.

Mr. GEORGE. It happened within ten miles of where I was at the time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have the evidence before me that the Senator gave before the Boutwell committee in regard to that.

Mr. GEORGE. That I gave?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have your evidence there.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think I was ever examined before the Boutwell committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have the evidence that was taken before that committee in regard to the occurrence.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, with reference to that Clinton murder, I had that matter investigated myself, and all there was in it was a fight, and that fight was this, I will inform the Senator: there was a joint discussion between the democrats and republicans at Clinton, and a fight grew up between the republicans and the democrats, and, as I believe, at the instigation of and commenced by the republicans, which resulted disastrously to them.

Mr. LOGAN. How many republicans were killed?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know how many; there were a good many white people killed and there were a good many black people killed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very few white people; thirty or forty black people.

Mr. LOGAN. How many democrats were killed?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was the old story of the wolf and the lamb.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know, Mr. President, when a few white people, not exceeding two hundred, were assaulted and attacked by a thousand of the other color and some of them killed, that the assaulted and weaker party were obliged to count exactly their own number that had been killed in making their efforts for self-defense.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi consent to be interrupted?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator not remember that during that campaign Mr. Chisholm, who was afterward murdered, being then the sheriff of Kemper County, was driven from his home and compelled to remain out of the town and in the woods concealed to escape violence threatened to him?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not. Mr. President, every killing that occurs in Mississippi is charged to the democrats for political purposes. Now, there is no man who deplores more than I do the Chisholm massacre, as it is called, but it is well known in Mississippi, just as well known as anything can be, that that whole trouble grew out of a private feud between Chisholm and his friends and a family by the name of Gully.

Mr. President, since I am up, as my colleague was unable (on account of exhaustion) to reply to some charges that were made against Mississippi in reference to repudiation, I will make a statement on that subject. I had expected that that calumny would not be revived now. I will make, for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] if he will listen to me, a statement on that subject, which will vindicate and justify the action of Mississippi.

The constitution of 1832 of Mississippi provided that the faith of the State should never be pledged for any loan unless the law authorizing the pledge was passed by one Legislature, then advertised in newspapers published in the State before the next general election, and then re-enacted by the succeeding Legislature. That was the constitution of Mississippi in 1832.

In 1838 the Legislature of Mississippi passed a law authorizing the pledge of the faith of the State of Mississippi for $15,500,000 to aid the Union Bank. That law made the State the guarantor or surety of the Union Bank. That law required the stock of the Union Bank to be amply secured for the purpose of indemnifying the State against liability on those bonds. That was the project which was submitted to the people of Mississippi at the succeeding election and which they authorized their representatives to re-enact and proceed under; but instead of doing that the Legislature passed another law, in which they made the State of Mississippi stockholder in the bank to the amount of $5,000,000, made her the principal debtor on bonds to the amount of $5,000,000 instead of being surety and guarantor as she was before, and without resubmitting it issued the bonds under that, and they were sold. The gentleman is a lawyer and can see the difference. The people agreed to be guarantors to the bank with ample indemnity to the amount of $15,500,000. The bonds were actually issued, and the law authorizing them, which was never submitted according to the constitution, made her a principal to the amount of $5,000,000. That law was never, as I said, submitted to the people as required by the constitution. Not a single dollar of that money ever went into the State treasury of Mississippi, and no subsequent Legislature ever ratified it or ever submitted it to the people. That is the whole thing on that; there is nothing else in it except that.

Now, Mr. President, I am very sorry that I have been compelled to participate in the discussion at all.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator in reference to what he is now stating whether the Legislature of Mississippi did not in a subsequent year, in the year 1841, in January, pass a resolution to the effect that the State was bound to the holders of the bonds of the State sold on account of the bank for the amount of the principal and the interest; and, furthermore, that the State of Mississippi would pay her bonds and preserve her faith inviolate. The Legislature at this time repudiated with great vigor the insinuation that the State of Mississippi would repudiate her bonds and violate her plighted faith. And did not the supreme court of his State, Chief-Justice

Yerger—I think chief-justice, at any rate judge—a man very famous throughout the country, delivering the opinion, declare that those bonds were binding and valid?

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer both questions. The Legislature, I believe, passed a resolution of that sort, but it was after the bonds were sold, not before. If the Legislature had not power to bind the State by the creation of the debt, they had not the power afterward by a mere resolution, without submitting it to the people, to validate an invalid debt.

Now, as to the decision made by the high court of errors and appeals of Mississippi, I will answer that question by asking the gentleman another, not for the purpose of annoying him at all, because I do not think I could annoy him by a question, but for the purpose of bringing out rather saliently the idea I have in view: Did not the Supreme Court of the United States decide in the Dred Scott case that Congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the Territories, and that free negroes could not be citizens of the United States, and did the American people submit to and acquiesce in that decision? Certainly not.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is answering the question which he proposed to ask me.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I thought I understood you to nod assent.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I say, in the first place, if the Senator desires to know my opinion on that subject, that the Supreme Court of the United States never so decided; it was a mere obiter dictum in regard to a point which the case did not present; next, that the American people changed all that by a change in their Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, before the change, did the American people acquiesce in that decision? Did the gentleman acquiesce in it?

Mr. HOAR. Not in that dictum.

Mr. GEORGE. Though the Senator may regard it an obiter dictum, the court did not think so. I will put another case. Did not the Supreme Court of the United States a few years ago decide that the legal-tender law was unconstitutional?

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, does the Senator from Mississippi seriously claim——

Mr. GEORGE. Never mind. If you will wait now I will show you the application I am going to make. I ask you that question. Did not the Supreme Court of the United States a few years ago so decide, not in an obiter dictum, but did they not render that judgment?

Mr. HOAR. Everybody knows the answer to that question. The Senator can answer it and make his application if he desires.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. That was the decision.

Mr. GEORGE. And about two years afterward they rendered a decision the other way, did they not? Now the application I want to make is this: we know that on political questions, it may be unfortunate that it is so, but such is the fact, judges who have formed opinions in reference to those questions before they went on the bench are apt to adhere to those opinions when they are upon the bench. The Dred Scott decision was made by a bench composed of judges who entertained those opinions before they went on the bench. As to the first legal-tender decision I do not know how that was in that regard, because I do not know how the judges had stood on that question; but it was evidently reversed by the infusion into the court of two men who held according to the opinions which they had entertained before they went upon the bench, and it is said they were put on the bench for that purpose. The supreme court of Mississippi happened at the time to be composed of three men every one of whom had been an active participant in the discussions which arose in 1841 and 1843 in reference to the liability of the State, and every one of them happened to be a man who had committed himself fully in every way, in every shape, to the doctrine that the State was liable.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi, then, if the sum and substance of this whole thing is not this: that he denounces our alliance with a man——

Mr. GEORGE. I have made no denunciation. You have not heard me denounce anybody.

Mr. HOAR. His associates have. Now, then, according to the Senator, the people of Mississippi allied themselves with men who repudiated the honest debt of that State according to the judgment of its own supreme court.

Mr. GEORGE. I denounce nobody. The Senator has not heard me denounce anybody. I have not even denounced that man who told his colleague that enormous story about Mississippi. I have treated him politely; I do not know but what he may have dreamed it or something of that sort; but I would not undertake to say after all my experience about men's swearing as to things occurring in Mississippi that the man was a constitutional liar instead of a crazy dreamer. The long and the short of it is just this, I will tell the Senator from Massachusetts that I have never met a lawyer outside of that court in Mississippi of any politics who concurred with the court in the conclusion which they reached. But that is not the way to decide that question, that is not the way to hold up a people for repudiating a debt. They had as much right to their opinion as to the justice and legality of that debt as the people of the United States had as to the legality and the propriety of the decision made in the Dred Scott case—just as much. It was a public question, and I undertake to say to the Senator that if he will look at it simply as a lawyer, without reference to the decision of the supreme court of Mississippi, he will arrive at the same conclusion that I have, that there is no legal validity, and never was any in it, and if the Senator wants a new decision of the court, we could soon get it down there I reckon now—just as you did on the legal-tender question here. If anybody would sue now, I suppose the court would decide the other way just as the Supreme Court here did on the legal-tender question. I have no doubt about that. I am very certain if I was on the bench I should hold that way, because I never had a doubt about it. So there is nothing in that.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I have said all I ought to have said, and I apologize for having taken up so much of the time of the Senate. I did not desire to do it; but I felt that if I did not do it I probably should be met with the charge of neglect of the duty I owe to the people of my State, and especially as my colleague was disabled from making a further reply.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not desire to continue this debate but a moment. The Senator from Mississippi who has just taken his seat [Mr. GEORGE] complained of me because I did not give him the name of the person who had been treated with the violence I have related. I am the last man to desire to make a misstatement to the disparagement of the people of his State or any other State, and I think when the Senator knows me more if he does not love me, in the language of his colleague, the Senator will understand that I intend to tell the truth.

I was commenting upon a reason, among others, why the Senator's colleague would find it difficult to get the ear of the North as he has in times past, and I suggested that this gray-headed old man, who was known among his people, known among his neighbors and townsmen, and in his county and State, would be listened to and believed before any of these platitudes about the peace and quiet and good order of Mississippi. I did not choose to give his name. I had his name here upon a piece of paper written by a highly distinguished and honorable member of the other House, whose neighbor before he went South this man was, who knew him as I know my neighbor, and to whom he related this story the day before yesterday in this city on his way North.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, may I interrupt——

Mr. DAWES. Wait one moment. I may not be justified in saying that his factory was burned, because the Senator says there are but three factories in the State.

Mr. GEORGE. I said very few.

Mr. DAWES. So I take it that he applied the term to some sort of structure that we would not call by that name at the North. I will tell him just precisely what was burned and that was this man's cotton-gin with improved machinery, his store and the house over it. The men may not have been properly factory hands. One of them was a blacksmith; the others were hands at work upon his plantation upon terms that he made with them for shares in the profits of the production. He was a large cotton-grower there with an establishment which I have described and which he has lost in this way. He has a partner who is now in New Orleans. The little remnant of his property remains there, what is not in the ashes, and I submit to the Senator that he does not think me quite so inconsiderate or quite so little understanding what has been done in the past as to furnish his name and the county and the residence, which I have here. All I ask of him is what I know he will accord when he knows me better, that I not only believe but have not a shadow of a doubt of the truth of this statement.

I state further that I saw myself last fall very much such a gentleman as this who had spent many years down there with a like result. He could not give up his political convictions, he did believe in trying to educate the poor men who were at work for him. This man who according to the account in the memorandum before me built a school-house for the colored people——

Mr. GEORGE. I have built two for them and I have never been murdered for it.

Mr. DAWES. I am very glad the Senator has, but the Senator shuts his eyes and fills his ears with cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. I have had a gin-house burned, too, and I have no more right to say that was burned because I built a school-house than——

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it was because you failed in running with the current.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I tell the honorable gentleman that I have just had a letter from home in which it is said that four of the hands working on my place have been drowned accidentally while crossing a lake. I do not think that was because I built school-houses, or because they were republicans.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator thinks that meets this charge he only illustrates what I was about to say, that the people among whom this gray-headed man is going will not have their confidence in him and his story impaired one whit by what the Senator has said to-day. The Senator lives there, and I take his word for it that he shuts his eyes and stops his ears, that he does not know what is happening all around him. I knew in my county an old Bourbon democrat once, who when a railroad came along there declared that there was nothing in the Constitution or the resolutions of '98 that authorized the taking of his land for a railroad, and it should not be done while he lived; but the railroad went along. He cleared out and left it, but it still went on. A few years afterward his son took him to a neighboring town on a visit, and just as they got into town he said, "Father, there's the train going along." He shut his eyes and stuffed his ears, and said, "I have never seen nor heard a railroad yet, John, and by the help of God I never will." [Laughter.] The train did not stop, sir; the great railroad went on to the great West. His eyes were shut and his ears were stuffed, but the wheels and the engines went on and did not heed him. So events in the Senator's own State are transpiring and filling the civilized world with horror, but the Senator has never heard of them! The Senator does not know that Dixon is dead; the Senator never heard that Hathaway was shot; the Senator has never heard that anything happened in 1875, though he was chairman of the democratic State committee, and claimed his reward after it was done for great achievement. He has heard nothing! Oh, sir, the Senator does not help his colleague to inspire confidence in the North by any such exhibition of sublime indifference and ignorance as he has manifested here to-day to the events that are transpiring before his eyes and the eyes of the American people. I tell him, sir, that he has enlisted in a lost cause again. The stars in their courses are fighting against those that are attempting to put down the free exercise of a man's rights as a citizen and the free utterance of the convictions of his judgment and his heart, [applause in the galleries,] and sooner or later it will come to the discomfiture of those who put themselves across the path. No, sir, it is idle for men to say they have never heard of these things, and they do not think they happened because they have never seen them. The world is looking on, and no such talk as this can either delude or deceive them.

Mr. VOORHEES, (who had several times addressed the Chair.) Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana desires to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Massachusetts does not behave very well. I have served with him so long that I know his habits somewhat. When he asked the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator on this side whether he would yield, there was a prompt response. I know it is a habit on his part, not on his side, but on his part, that when any Senator here desires to say something by way of inquiry he takes on a seeming frenzy, a sort of raving style, a war dance as if he was oblivious of everything that anybody could address to him.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. No; I decline to yield absolutely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana must remember that he has the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. VOORHEES. The courtesy of the Senator, I do not appeal to of course, for I know it is scant.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator cannot have it.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is scant. He has been on the floor so much that I supposed it would be a relief to everybody to get him off the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, have I the right to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded to the Senator from Indiana for some purpose. The Senator from Massachusetts has a right to resume the floor whenever he pleases.

Mr. DAWES. So I supposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DAWES. Not just this minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that if he asked the floor of me, if he appealed to my courtesy solely for the purpose of reading me a lecture, he has quite mistaken me again.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought that was what you needed.

Mr. DAWES. Very likely.

Mr. VOORHEES. Especially as courtesy has been extended to you on this side and never returned.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator may be angry with me——

Mr. VOORHEES, Not at all, sir. Nothing delights me more than the conduct of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator can have anything he asks of me if he appeals to my courtesy. The Senator can have nothing at my hands when he undertakes to browbeat or threaten. If the Senator wants anything on these terms of me, they are at his service. If he does not like these terms, he must appeal to somebody else with his threats.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I never undertake to browbeat or threaten——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Pardon me, I have the floor now.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that the Senator has the floor. I will take the opinion of the Chair whether the Senator has the floor or not.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly. I do not want the floor if the Senator from Massachusetts holds it. He wants it nearly all the time, and of course I shall let him have it.

Mr. DAWES. The Chair is mistaken.

Mr. VOORHEES. I supposed the Senator yielded when he sat down; but there are some things that you cannot understand on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has an evasive, dodging way of sitting down and getting up that deludes a Senator.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, if the rules of the Senate can be enforced, I shall be glad. I stated to the Senator that he could not have the floor on the terms on which he assumed to take it from me.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, I have understood that so far as that side is concerned, we cannot have the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I want to know whether I have the floor or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, I hope the Senator will, when he thinks of it a moment, reflect and come to the conclusion that he had better treat his fellow-Senators with proper courtesy and then expect from them all that which courtesy in this body always yields.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, will the Senator now concede that I have a right to say a word?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator desires the floor on these terms, nothing will give me greater pleasure than to yield it to him.

Mr. VOORHEES. It seems he is afraid to allow me to have the floor two minutes, or one minute. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, in all kindness, that he need not be alarmed on that subject, but I do say to him—and I say it with a heart which has no malice toward any fellow-being, because I think that mainly the religion I have is a love of my race, and it is broad enough to embrace the Senator from Massachusetts—I say to him that I really think he forgets that everybody on this side of the Chamber, especially the new Senator from Mississippi this afternoon, has without one moment's hesitation never refused to yield to him whenever he desired to interpose with a question, or to anybody else on that side. I am not venerable enough, or if I was I am the last man to do it, to suggest a reproof, much less to lecture the senior Senator from Massachusetts; but it seems at times when an humble individual desires to interpose a word or ask a question while he is speaking that he takes on an additional vehemence, a good deal as I have seen a locomotive, inspired by some spiteful engineer who saw somebody at a way station he did not like, and when that person wanted to get aboard as a passenger, the engineer put on additional steam and ran by with great velocity. So the Senator from Massachusetts generally conducts himself when anybody on this side of the Chamber desires to interrupt him by a question, while on the other hand we here never hesitate one moment to give him or anybody else a chance to make an observation that seems to him fitting and proper on the subject-matter at that particular moment under discussion.

It may be, Mr. President, that I will offer some observations at another time, but I will not do it of course beholden to the Senator from Massachusetts for the courtesy of the floor. We are beholden to him for a great deal. He is managing this thing, managing it well, as finely as possible, and we will stay here as long as he will stay. I hope that is not treason, but we will do it nevertheless. For the present, that is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have endeavored during the debate on the resolutions that are pending to keep my temper, and I have endeavored to conduct myself as well as I could. The Senator from Indiana is tired of my remarks and I do not think he is the only one who is. I am conscious that the whole Senate has become tired of them. I regret exceedingly anything that I may have said in reply to the Senator from Indiana which can be construed by any gentleman into an improper remark. I shall endeavor myself to maintain the usages of the Senate to the utmost of my power. I have no doubt that when the Senator comes here in the morning he will think that he has said some things that he ought not to have said, and therefore I do not desire to make any further allusion. The Senator has succeeded, however, in so interrupting the current of this debate on my part as to put an end to the remarks that I was following out when he interrupted me.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon. Really I could not hear the Senator and I should like to hear him. I always hear him with pleasure. Did he move to adjourn to take time to think on the subject? Was there a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, he did not make that motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I only wanted to know.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. May I be allowed a word?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I yield now to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to take back in his last speech most of that which he had said in his first speech in relation to this alleged outrage in Mississippi——

Mr. DAWES. Take back!

Mr. GEORGE. Or qualify or state it in some other way and differently. I understand now that there was no factory burned; it was only a gin-house. Well, as I was saying, is there any evidence here that that gin-house was burned by an incendiary? It is the most common thing in the world for a gin-house to burn in Mississippi and everywhere else. Nothing is more inflammable. I have lost one myself, and my neighbors lose them all around me every year. Is there any evidence now that it was burned by an incendiary; and if it was burned by an incendiary is there any evidence that it was burned by a democrat who hated this man on account of his political opinions? That is all taken for granted. A gin-house was burned; it was in Mississippi; it belonged to a Massachusetts man; the Massachusetts man comes away very much disgusted from having lost his gin, as we all are when we lose our gins; he comes away, and he tells somebody and that somebody tells the Senator from Massachusetts that the democrats burned it.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, to the gentleman's fairness—because he cannot be so unfair as to desire to do an injustice to the people of Mississippi—if that is a fair way to blacken the good name of a whole people. The Senator is a lawyer. When he retails in the Senate stories of that sort, he ought to know the kind of evidence which will support them. I understood him first to say—I was mistaken about that, I have no doubt—that this gentleman from Massachusetts told him. Now I understand that this gentleman from Massachusetts who lost his gin told somebody else who told the Senator. Am I right about that, that you did not get it from the gentleman himself?

Mr. DAWES. Do you yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, to answer that question, not to make a speech.

Mr. DAWES. No, I do not want to make a speech.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. Am I right in stating that now you say that you did not get your information directly from the citizen of Massachusetts, who had been sojourning in Mississippi, who lost his gin-house?

Mr. DAWES. I will cover it all with a correction of the Senator's statement with which he commenced, and that was that I had taken back or modified a single word I had said. He is mistaken. I adhere to every word I have stated.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, did you answer my question?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir, I answered the question.

Mr. GEORGE. Did you tell me whether you got it from the gentleman directly or second-hand?

Mr. DAWES. I restate it now just as I stated it then.

Mr. GEORGE. But here you do not understand the point.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, I do understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. I asked did you get your information directly from the gentleman whose factory had been burned, or did you get it second-hand?

Mr. DAWES. That is a question which the Senator has no business to put to me. I assume here in the Senate the truth of what I state, and the Senator does not know what becomes a Senator of the United States when he undertakes to catechise me in that way. Sir, what I state here I state of my own responsibility.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I certainly do not desire to violate any of the usages or courtesies of the Senate; but I mean to say, in response to the last suggestion made by the gentleman, that while I am a new member here, and while I shall endeavor to learn and to observe what is due to this body and to each member of it, I certainly shall not either apply or submit to being educated by him on that subject. I suppose I may make this statement without violating the usages of the Senate or what is due from one Senator to another.

The Senator in his last speech said that I knew nothing about the Hathaway murder, that I knew nothing about the Chisholm murder, that I knew nothing about the Dixon murder, and upon that he made an argument to show to the people of this country that I had either willfully shut my ears to what was going on in Mississippi or that I had paid no attention to what was going on. I desire to say in reply that the gentleman's argument was based upon statements repeated by him as having been made by me which I never made and which every Senator here ought to know and does know that I did not make. I did not say that I had never heard of the Hathaway murder. I said that if I had heard of it I had forgotten it. I did not say that I had not heard of the Chisholm murder, as the gentleman put in my mouth. I said I had heard of it, and that I heard of it in such a way as to authorize me to say that what the Senator had said about it was untrue.

Mr. DAWES. I did not say a word about the Chisholm murder.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, whoever it was over there; some one spoke about it. I did not say any of these things.

Now, to come back to the point where the gentleman said I had no right to interfere. I have a right to interfere. I have a right to ask a Senator who undertakes to retail here what I say is a foul calumny upon the people of Mississippi—and it is his duty to answer it—who his author is. I have a right to know whose falsehood he is backing by his authority here in the Senate and to tell the Senator that he cannot escape from the responsibility which I now place on him of having before the American Senate and in the hearing of the American people retailed an infamous slander upon the people of Mississippi by saying that I have no right to demand his authority. I have a right. If he assumes it, as I understood him to say he would, then, sir, I say he becomes responsible for the falsehood.

The Senator said he did not take back what he had said. I say, sir, he did. He regaled our ears with a statement of this sort, that a Massachusetts man who had gone to Mississippi had built a factory, and had to put iron shutters to his house to protect himself and his workmen, and because he had built a school-house or something of that sort or was heard to express certain opinions his factory had been burnt and his employés murdered. That was his statement, sir. I asked him, as I was obliged to do, (and I did it with great hesitation and modesty because I did not want to occupy the floor,) who his man was, where was the locality of this arson and murder, and I am answered and the Senators who feel any interest in this matter are answered that this fugitive from Mississippi to Massachusetts was in danger in his Massachusetts home of personal violence from the democrats of Mississippi if his name was disclosed. Sir, how frail an excuse! Will the gentleman undertake to persuade the American people that the Mississippi democrat is not only a murderer and assassin in his own land but that he is ubiquitous and can perform his part in Mississippi and in Massachusetts at the same time?

I told the Senator that I had not heard of any such thing; and it turns out that it was no factory that was burned; it was a gin-house. When I informed the Senator that a gin-house was the most inflammable of all buildings, that I and others in my neighborhood had suffered losses in that way, that it was the commonest thing in the world for a gin-house to be destroyed by fire, and then asked him if he had any evidence that this man's gin-house had not been destroyed by the same accidents that destroy other people's——

Mr. DAWES. And men were killed in the same way?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I do not believe your men were killed. You do not dare to name your witness. I believe your witness to be a false witness.

Mr. DAWES. I did not expect you would believe it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not in the habit of believing men who do not disclose who they are. I am not apt to believe such men——

Mr. DAWES. If you wanted to believe it you would have to leave Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose the gentleman would want me to believe a lie like he does! I suppose he would have me "to believe a lie that I might be damned." I do not propose to carry my credulity that far. Who is his witness, sir? Who is he? I do not believe his gin-house has been burned; I do not believe he has been down there; I do not believe his Massachusetts man was ever there; I do not believe he had a gin-house. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order must be preserved.

Mr. GEORGE. And I have a right to say so because he does not disclose himself. It is a very easy matter for gentlemen for political purposes to fly around this country from one part to another and represent themselves as the victims of outrages; but when a people of a whole State are to be held responsible for these alleged outrages, have they not the ordinary right secured by the Constitution and laws to everybody charged with crime to know something of the accuser and of the times and the circumstances surrounding the alleged crime.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I do it for the edification of the Senator from Massachusetts. In 1871 a joint committee of twenty-one was appointed to investigate the condition of the Southern States in regard to what was known as the Ku-klux bill. My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was one of them. There were a hundred cases investigated; I can turn to the evidence in these volumes where persons told of all sorts of outrages, and did not dare to disclose their names for fear of outrage upon them. We forced some of them to tell their names, and every time the name was developed the party was proved to be guilty of an infamous falsehood, until in a republican Congress, with two-thirds republican majority in each House, when the report was made and the testimony laid before them, they never dared call up the bill because of just such lies as men who did not dare to tell their names attempted to palm off.

Mr. DAWES. I believe the Senator——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BECK. I only wanted to mention this fact.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator said he did it for my benefit and I want to respond. I want to ask him——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not abuse my courtesy. I will yield a moment.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Georgia is willing I should like to make my acknowledgments to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly. I say I will yield with a great deal of pleasure, but I hope the Senator will not make a speech.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky when he says there was not a word of truth in it alludes to the opinion which Reverdy Johnson expressed when he was sent down there by these disbelievers to defend those men, and when after having heard those horrors described by eye witnesses he threw up his brief in as bitter denunciation of those outrages as ever fell from mortal lips.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I had sincerely hoped that such a scene as we have witnessed here to-day would never again occur in an American Congress. Years ago it was the custom in this body and in the other to retail charges of outrages and murders and assassinations against the southern people when the representatives of the southern people were not here to meet them, and I remember distinctly it was a habit in those days for gentlemen to get up and read letters and make statements of great outrages which had been committed at the South, and when they were called on for the names of their authors they refused to give them and gave the old stereotyped answer that the Senator from Massachusetts gave to-day, that they would not disclose the names, as it would subject the parties to persecution.

Sir, as I say, I had hoped that day had passed by. The South is here now; she has her own chosen Senators and Representatives; and gentlemen on the other side have chosen of their own accord to make this issue, to renew these slanders, and they are renewing the very style and habit practiced here years ago for the purpose of impressing the northern mind of their truth. We never should have referred to them; we are willing to be judged by our acts now; we are willing to let the past be buried; but gentlemen on the other side are not only not willing to let the past be buried but we are distinctly notified here to-day that the very purpose of the remarkable coalition which has been formed (for now it is confessed to be a coalition) with certain parties in Virginia is to inaugurate a new movement to put the domination of that State under a certain class of people specified by the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday to be the negroes and the republicans and such democrats as will unite with them. That is it, and to put Virginia under the domination of those classes of people, and that force and effect may be given to that issue, these charges are revamped, these slanders upon the South are repeated. What is called the "outrage mill," which ought to have been burned before the gin-house was burned, is to be revived.

Sir, I was born in the South; I was raised there; I am identified with that people. I have not risen this afternoon to make a speech, but I have risen to say in kindness, to say in fearlessness, to say in perfect firmness to the gentlemen on the other side that we are prepared to meet their issue; we shall meet it unflinchingly, and I wish the American people to understand now that the issue which the gentlemen tender embraces three propositions:

First, if the southern people, what one Senator in characteristic Phariseeism called Bourbon democrats, are guilty of the murders, the assassinations, the frauds, the oppressions, the wrongs upon the colored people or upon anybody, northern people, republicans, or any other people that are charged, if the southern people, the democrats of the South, are guilty of these outrages, then I concede that they are barbarians; I concede that they have no right to representation on this floor or any other floor; I concede that they ought to be driven into the sea.

On the other hand, if the southern people are not guilty of these outrages, if the charges are false, then they who make them as well as they who use them, and seek to profit by them, are wicked, graceless, godless slanderers, compared to whom a barbarian is a gentleman. We meet you on that issue fearlessly, and understand it.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir; you need not ask me now any question. I will not give way now to you especially; I shall give way to you in due time and will take charge of you.

A third proposition is this: If the outrages that did once occur in the South were not committed by the southern democrats, by what you call the Bourbon democracy, if such outrages as did exist there—and at a certain time I concede there were outrages—were the result of the policy which you enforced upon the South at a time when the southern people themselves were helpless, then it will be submitted to the judgment of the enlightened people of the North whether you are not responsible for such outrages as did occur, and not what you call the Bourbon democracy.

These are the three propositions. You have chosen to revive them. Let the world distinctly understand that we have not done so. We have hoped that the ringing, eloquent words of the republican President in his inaugural would be accepted; that the passions of the war should be hushed; that the issues of the war should be settled; that the decrees of the war should be accepted as adjudicated, and that debate upon all those questions should be considered as terminated and ended. But, sir, the ink is scarcely dry upon the paper which printed that inaugural before you tell us that you have inaugurated a coalition to affect the coming election in the State of Virginia which we are told is the beginning of the end, which we are told is the beginning of a movement by which you by virtue of a coalition with certain classes in that State propose to control that State and put the people of that State under the domination of that coalition. Very well; I say we accept the issue; the people of Virginia will accept it; the people of the South will accept it. Gentlemen, you understand, I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts has learned that when you came in here to retail outrages I want your authority. What a monstrous exhibition it is to the American people that a man can get up in the Senate Chamber and say that these outrages have been committed, which make the people of that country murderers and assassins, and then not give the authority for the charge!

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] submitted a very fair proposition. I say we must meet that. He said that he was not prepared to retract his charges against the carpet-bag governments several years ago; he reaffirmed them. That was manly; I admired the Senator for it. He added that now we had possession of our own governments, as I understood him, and that those governments had peace, we must bring proofs to show that we had improved the condition of things or we would be subject to the same condemnation which he visited upon those governments. I do not use his language. I am endeavoring to express his idea. That is fair. We will meet that; and if we do not show by proof irrefragable that all the evils complained of in the carpet-bag governments have been relieved and remedied by the democratic governments in those States, then we submit that the change was not an improvement. If we fail, we are prepared to be condemned.

And in this connection I wish to repeat right here to the fair-minded gentlemen on the other side the proposition I stated the other day, and that is this: you may take the Southern States that were subjected to carpet-bag rule, and just in proportion to the length of time the democrats have had possession of the governments of those States, in that exact proportion have the people, including the colored people, improved and progressed in material prosperity and in educational advancement. The improvement has been continual. I have repeated on this floor once before what I will say here again in this direct connection, the carpet-bag governments or the reconstruction governments had possession of my State for about four years. During that time no colored people were educated; no public schools were established; the colored people accumulated no property. The democratic party have had possession of that government now for ten years, and we are educating annually over seventy thousand colored children at the public expense, and the colored people of that State have accumulated over six millions of property which is assessed for taxes upon their own affidavits.

We will accept, therefore, the issue so fairly, so manfully tendered by the Senator from Maine.

But the Senator from Maine made another proposition, which I shall meet with equal fairness. He says the question is whether their methods, or what he and others would call our methods, are to obtain in the future government of the southern country; and he tells us what his methods were in Maine, that they were the methods of changing evils by peaceable means, by lawful means. That is right. If he will show that we change evils in Georgia or any other Southern State by other means by credible testimony, not by such witnesses as we have been treated to here to-day, if he will show by competent, proper testimony that we are proposing to change systems there by violence, he will have made out a case. But I tell the Senator from Maine we understand the methods of his party in the South. We know nothing about his methods up in Maine; they may be very peaceable and very orderly there, but the methods of his party down South were the carpet-bag methods; they were the reconstruction methods; they were methods which educated no colored children; they were methods which enabled the colored people to accumulate no property; they were methods which kept up a perpetual irritation and strife between the races in that country; they were methods which produced anarchy, which threatened the very existence of civilization. That is what his methods were in the South. Do we understand that those methods are to be renewed? Do we understand that in order to recommence those methods this Senate is to stop, and the executive business of this Government is not to be transacted? The courts are to stand vacant, offices to stand unfilled, the business of the country to stand utterly blockaded in order that you may inaugurate those methods again in the South. Is that the purpose? If so, I tell you firmly and kindly you will fail. You inaugurated those methods before by the bayonet; you inaugurated and sustained them by the military. You cannot do that again. The southern people are on their feet, and they mean to have good government; they mean to protect their interests; they mean to protect the colored people; they mean to educate the colored people to the best of their ability; they mean to educate their own people; they mean to stop murders and outrages of every kind; they mean to give all their people as much protection as the people of any other State have; and they do not intend to submit to the return of your carpet-bag methods; and we are willing to go before the people of the North on this question.

I have faith in the intelligence, in the virtue, in the manhood of the masses of the northern people. I have had myself illustrations given to me by as good northern people as I ever saw, republicans telling me the harrowing stories which have influenced their conduct for years, retailed to them by these miserable creatures that profess to have gone down South and not been allowed to stay because of their political opinions, and which were utterly untrue. If I chose to increase the literature on this subject, I could tell this Senate the details of a transaction that came to my knowledge from New York not long since, an outrage said to have occurred near my own town, which was utterly mythical, and yet the outrage was absolutely stated in a public meeting of a Christian assembly, in a church communion at a quarterly meeting of the Methodist Church, and the whole house was in tears at the narration of the terrible outrage upon the poor negro people in a lake near Atlanta, which never occurred in the world, never occurred anywhere, which was utterly mythical. The man wound up with an appeal for money. He wanted contributions from the northern people to help good missionaries like him to go down there and convert these terrible Bourbons from the error of their ways. Those people were honest. The whole northern mind has been impregnated with such stories.

Mr. President, it is getting late, and I suppose the Senate wishes to adjourn. I have said nothing in unkindness. I regret very much that this issue has been made. If it is to be made we must meet it:

but gentlemen must understand that this is not 1865, this is not 1867, this is not 1868. Those days are past; the South is here with her chosen representatives, and if they are not able to vindicate their people from these foul aspersions they are not fit to sit here, and their people have no right to have anybody here. If they are able to vindicate them you owe it to yourselves to cease making these slanderous charges against a people who are as brave, as intelligent, and as virtuous as yourselves.

Mr. DAWES and Mr. LOGAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the Senator from Illinois. I was going to move an adjournment.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to make a speech, I merely wish to say a word. In so far as the discussion of outrages are concerned, I have not participated at all. I will say, however, in all kindness, I do not think any issue has been tendered by either side so far as this question is concerned. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] himself commenced this discussion by an assault upon the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] such a one as has seldom been heard in this Senate Chamber. Out of that grew this discussion. In passing along with the discussion some allusion was made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to that State, which was replied to by the other Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] and this question arose and has been pursued by different Senators, but not as an issue before the Senate.

I do not desire to enter into a discussion in reference to these southern outrages, but I rose to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to one thing. It will not do for the Senator from Georgia or for any other Senator to rise on this floor to notify us that they propose to go to the northern people to refute these calumnies, as the Senator calls them. I should not have alluded to this matter, but the Senator from Georgia says, "Bring me names of men murdered." I am only going to call his attention to this in order to say to him that there is no necessity for the issue of which he speaks, especially no necessity for going to the northern people on that issue. If these things are past and forgotten that is one thing, but when they are brought to the minds of the people again that is another thing. When the Senator says that these issues were made before the American people, when the southern people were not represented and that they were slanders, I call his attention to the fact that there is a record here which is not a slander, a record made in reference to the assassinations in Louisiana and Texas and other portions of the South during two years that amounted to two thousand, and the names are recorded in a report here before the Senate of the United States. The Senator [Mr. BUTLER] laughs, but, sir, it is as true as Holy Writ.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not believe one word of it—not one word.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says he does not believe one word of it. Well, sir, the report signed by General Sheridan, made after examinations and investigations by his officers, does give the names of men, women, and children who were murdered. When you say that you do not believe one word of it you know that you make an assertion against evidence that cannot be refuted.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not often intrude upon his occupancy of the floor; but I had occasion a year ago to thoroughly investigate the condition of the South on the race and color line. We went through the whole of it, and you were not left on your side without able representatives, very able representatives. I want to emphasize the observation of the Senator from South Carolina, and whatever may come of it I say that I do not believe one word of the statement said to have been made by General Sheridan on Louisiana; and I will go a little further and say that I believe it all to be utterly false. Now make the most of that.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not rise for the purpose of causing any excitement or ill-feeling, but merely to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that these things as a whole should not be denied on this floor when the evidence has been given time and again. The Senator from Indiana rises here and says he does not believe one word of it. Is it not a fact that at one time in the streets of New Orleans over two hundred persons were murdered in cold blood? Does he deny that?

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, as he has my respect and kindness of heart, for I knew him in the old days, the reason why I take the liberty of stating so broadly my belief on this subject is not born out of impulse. I was the chairman of a committee that went over this whole ground, and I do not believe the Senator from Illinois in his partisan zeal would think I would find in favor of cruelty and inhumanity.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not believe you would.

Mr. VOORHEES. I came to the delicate conclusion that General Sheridan had been overreached by zealous and unscrupulous politicians in New Orleans and elsewhere in Louisiana. I am not here to say that General Sheridan would do so base an injustice as my remarks might possibly imply; but I do sincerely bear witness here as far as my poor humble voice may go to the fifty million people in the United States, that after spending nearly one year of careful, conscientious investigation, I do not believe that his statements were correct.

Mr. LOGAN. I rose, as I first stated, merely to make a suggestion, as Senators were talking about an issue, that there was no necessity for an issue about a fact that had been settled, a thing that had been proven, a thing that the country understood and knew; and that there was no necessity for going to the northern people for the purpose of refuting the statement. That is all I rose for the purpose of saying. But when the Senator from Indiana and other Senators rise and say that they do not believe one word of it, let me call their attention to the record. Right on this floor, in this Chamber, I proved and demonstrated to the country that one of the then Senators from Georgia, not now a member of this body, was elected the chief of the Ku Klux Klan in Georgia. I proved it from his own sworn statement, although he said in the statement that he never had anything to do with the Ku Klux Klan, or knew of any outrages by this organization to which he had been appointed chief. I say this to the credit of the ex-Senator. Will the Senator deny the fact that in North Carolina the Ku Klux were arraigned and tried, and that Reverdy Johnson refused further to defend them on account of the atrocities they had committed? Will any man deny that when the facts are of record in the courts? Does the Senator not know that they were sent to the penitentiary? Does he not know that President Grant pardoned them?

Mr. DAWES. They pleaded guilty.

Mr. LOGAN. They pleaded guilty. Yet will the Senator stand here and in the face of the American people say that there is not one word of truth in the statement?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to say that the person to whom he alluded, my late colleague, is not present.

Mr. LOGAN. I said he was not present.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I know, and it is therefore proper, I think, for the Senator from Illinois, as he has made a statement relating to Senator Gordon, also to read what General Gordon said on that subject, and let him be judged by that. I wish it distinctly understood that I think General Gordon's understanding of the matter was very different from what was stated by the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state exactly what I said. I did not name the Senator. I said that he rose here and said that although elected to take charge of that klan he never had anything to do with it. I said that I made that statement in justice to Senator Gordon but a moment ago, but I stated that I proved from the evidence that he was elected the chief of the klan in Georgia, although he on the floor said he never had anything to do with it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. As Senator Gordon is not here I know the Senator from Illinois does not wish to do him injustice——

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; and I made that statement in connection with it at the time.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Wait. I know the Senator from Illinois does not desire to do anybody injustice and especially a Senator who is not here——

Mr. LOGAN. I do not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me go on. Therefore it is proper to add, and I know the Senator will take pleasure in allowing me to call his attention to the fact, that if I recollect Senator Gordon's testimony (it has been a long time since I read it; I read it myself) Senator Gordon utterly denied that the organization, or whatever it was, to which he was elected was the Ku Klux Klan in the sense in which that klan is understood; but it was an organization of gentlemen simply to protect themselves in cases of outrage in which the carpet-bag governments would not protect them.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I am willing to let that go. I do not care anything about the statement.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is the honest truth about it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; you may state it that way. But what I was stating is the fact that those klans were organized, and the result was the conviction of members of the klan before the courts in their own State, and the clemency of the President of the United States was asked and was granted to relieve them, on the promise of men high in position that their outrages would cease.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any such thing as a Ku Klux Klan or vigilance committee in the State of Illinois?

Mr. LOGAN. Not that I know of.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator is as ignorant of what is going on in his own State, if the newspapers are to be credited, as the Senator from Massachusetts said the Senator from Mississippi is.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is another issue.

Mr. BUTLER. I saw in the papers not more than three days ago where in the Senator's own State of Illinois a vigilance committee had been organized in some town, the name of which I now forget.

Mr. JONAS. Charleston.

Mr. BUTLER. A vigilance committee had been organized there, and men and women had been taken out at night and whipped and ordered to leave the country. Can the Senator be held responsible for that? I saw from the papers that in the State of Ohio the other day, where a young man had gone into a certain town and insulted two newspaper editors, a rope was tied around his neck and he was dragged out of town and ordered to leave. I saw from the papers that in the State of Maine the other day the most atrocious murders were perpetrated. Is the Senator from Maine responsible for that, and is the Senator from Illinois responsible for what occurred in his State?

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will give him an answer.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the Senator responsible for the one hundred and twenty-one men of his own color who were shot down in the streets of Chicago in 1877?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the Senator responsible for the twenty-odd or thirty-odd people who were shot down in the streets of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, by the soldiery of the country in 1877? Is he responsible for that? Yet he gets up here and undertakes to hold the southern Senators responsible for every outrage perpetrated during the reign of the carpet-baggers whom the Senator helped to fasten upon the country. [Applause and hisses in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the Senator from South Carolina through?

Mr. COCKRELL. I gave notice——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Illinois is getting up here——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will suspend. The Chair will admonish spectators in the galleries that such disorderly proceedings will not be tolerated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the galleries be cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to enforce order on the floor and in the galleries.

Mr. COCKRELL. I gave notice yesterday that I should move that the galleries be cleared if applause or disapprobation should be again manifested. I shall insist upon the galleries being cleared if there is any applause or disapprobation expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Missouri modified his notice so as to have the Sergeant-at-Arms remove only those who are disorderly.

Mr. LOGAN. I have the floor.

Mr. BECK. I know you have. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms remove only the disorderly persons, not all the people in the galleries. It would be unfair to punish the innocent with the guilty.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will reply to the Senator from South Carolina in a much better humor than he did to me.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is very much mistaken if he supposes that I am out of humor.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator then allow me to reply?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish the Senator to reply by misrepresenting me. I am not out of humor. I am as amiable as the Senator is.

Mr. LOGAN. I will reply that, so far as a vigilance committee in Charleston, Illinois, is concerned, I know nothing about that. Certainly none exists to interfere with men on account of their political opinions. So far as the shooting down of people in Chicago is concerned, I do know something about that. When the Senator says that one hundred and twenty people were shot because a riot occurred there he misstates the number. If there was ever anybody killed there that fact has not been ascertained.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what the newspapers stated.

Mr. LOGAN. Still that is not material. That was not an organization in violation of the law. The militia were enforcing the law and not violating it by committing cold murder.

Mr. BUTLER. What were they shot for?

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will keep his seat I will answer him.

Mr. BUTLER. I will keep my seat when the Chair requires me to keep my seat.

Mr. LOGAN. I have the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not sit down at the dictation of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield, and the Chair must protect him.

Mr. BUTLER. I will take my seat if the Senator asks me in a proper manner, but I do not intend to sit down at the dictation of the Senator; he must understand that.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator can sit down or stand up as he chooses.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, of course I do.

Mr. LOGAN. It is very well you do, but I will say to the Senator I do not command him to sit down nor to stand up. I did it in no bad grace; but there is none of this bravado that will deter me from saying what I desire to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me to say that none of that bravado will prevent me from expressing what I believe to be true?

Mr. LOGAN. Of course; I understand.

Mr. BUTLER. The rôle of the bravado has no more influence upon me than it has upon him, let me remind him.

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody would suppose that the rôle of the bravado would influence the Senator; of course not; nobody pretended it would. Excitement is no evidence of genius, nor does it supply the want of brains, nor at any time will this pretended austere manner prove the wisdom of a man on this floor or anywhere else.

Now I will answer the Senator. I say to him that the riot in Chicago was the carrying out of the laws in order to suppress a mob. It was not Ku Klux organized for the murdering of innocent people. So far as this Ohio matter is concerned, I know nothing about it.

But what I was saying was in response to the Senator from Georgia when he talked about an issue being tendered, and he said there was no truth in these statements. I am talking about unlawful organizations to assassinate and murder people. When the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Indiana say there is no truth in this statement, the records of the country, the court records, the history of the time, the records of the Senate, the records of the House, disprove the assertion that has been made from beginning to end by those Senators.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator must allow me to say that I said nothing about that record in Louisiana. I know nothing about it. I have never investigated it. I simply want to correct him.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say this——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know anything about it one way or the other.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, if the Senator knows nothing about it why does he say he will go to the northern people and show that these are slanders against his people?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator has no right to misrepresent me.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to do so.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I made no such statement, with all due deference to the Senator, and I hope when he lectures others about excitement he will not get excited himself.

Mr. LOGAN. I am perfectly cool, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will understand me as saying that I have no knowledge of the Louisiana murders that have been alleged here; I know nothing about them. Of course, judging the statement by others like it, I have a belief about it; but I know nothing about it, and I have said nothing about it. I said that the charges that these murders and assassinations and outrages and wrongs were perpetrated by what was called the democracy of the South were untrue, and that the facts alleged did not exist. I said that such outrages as had occurred were under the carpet-bag governments as the direct fruit of the policy of those governments; that when those governments ceased those outrages ceased, and that that country has been just as peaceful and just as quiet ever since as any other country in the world. I understand, not the Senator, but others on that side who have spoken, to make the issue here that it is necessary to form this coalition for the purpose of putting the State of Virginia under the domination of the people who have entered into it so as to secure the rights of everybody, to stop assassination and wrongs, and I said that it was a false charge upon which I was willing to go before the American people.

Mr. LOGAN. I am sure that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will not say that I am not generous in yielding at all times for their speeches. I now desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that when he spoke of false statements and false charges against the South he included all the South, and I rose merely to call his attention and not for the purpose of exciting my amiable friend from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not excited.

Mr. LOGAN. Who heretofore has always been so amiable and all at once has become so much to the contrary—not for the purpose of arousing him, as he is like a lion when he is aroused, and yet no terrors spring from it——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is like a lion all the time, whether he is aroused or not.

Mr. LOGAN. I say to the Senator from Georgia I stated in reference to Louisiana and Texas massacres what the evidence shows. He said that men should give names. I tell him that the report made by General Sheridan, based upon the evidence and the facts known to him and his officers, does give the names of the persons murdered, and there were more than two thousand of those persons during the time mentioned. He gives the names in his reports. So when the Senator speaks about names, I refer him to that report. There he will find the names by the hundred, and names that cannot be disputed, because the people there yet know that these people lived, and they know that they are now dead, and dead by the hands of the democracy of that country.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to interrupt him, as he has referred to my State?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator be kind enough to give me that report? I crossed to his seat to see if the book he holds in his hands is the report.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to have that report.

Mr. LOGAN. Which report?

Mr. MAXEY. The report to which the Senator refers, made by General Sheridan; and I should like to have him point out to me in that report where General Sheridan or any officer of his has ever stated that murders in my State were perpetrated by democrats or were perpetrated in any sense of the word for political purposes, and when they were committed and by whom they were committed.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says he would like to have the report. He shall have the report. I told him when he came across to my seat that this was not the report; I was merely holding this book in my hand. I sent for the report a minute ago. It has been in the Senate time and again; it has been read here; I have heard it read here. I will get it for the benefit of the Senator when I get time. But when the Senator asks me if these people were murdered by democrats and who says so, I tell him the report shows that republicans were murdered, and they were murdered for political reasons. I will ask him if he supposes they all committed suicide? [Laughter.]

Mr. MAXEY. I have only to say that if murders were committed in Texas for political purposes, murders committed by democrats upon republicans and because they were republicans, as he now states it, I denounce that statement, whether made in that report or elsewhere, as absolutely without foundation, unfair, untrue, and false.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly the Senator can do that, and yet I will call the Senator's attention to one thing that perhaps he has not forgotten. While a Senator from Texas occupied a seat in this Chamber, ex-Senator Hamilton, who is no longer here, I remember that, standing right there he made the statement that in Texas some forty people were murdered at one time. He said it right from that seat, and showed the facts, or at least I understood him to do so, from papers and other evidence.

Mr. MAXEY. I know the facts as well as the former Senator from Texas, Mr. Hamilton, and I participated in the debate to which the Senator from Illinois refers. It was charged here upon a paper given into the hands of my former colleague that a murder was committed upon some negroes in Groesbeck. I proved that Captain Applewhaite, as good a man as there was in the State of Texas or elsewhere, was shot in cold blood by a gang; that the gang were finally hunted down and were put into the penitentiary for the crime; and that in the hunt for the men some of them were killed, but in the lawful attempt of the sheriff to execute a lawful writ for their arrest. That is the character of the murders which are charged in that foul and false report.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I have certainly demonstrated one thing, if I have not demonstrated anything else, and that is I have stirred up my friends considerably, and not by making any misstatements either. I am perfectly willing that these gentlemen shall call General Sheridan a falsifier if they desire. I am perfectly willing that they shall charge him, if they desire, with trying to falsify the record.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator just a minute?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will just allow me to finish what I have got to say. I will only say that this is in the report that I have alluded to, and no more honorable man lives to-day than General Sheridan, and no more truthful man lives——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does he make the statement on his personal knowledge?

Mr. LOGAN. He makes it in his official character, from investigations made under his orders by his officers.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not wish the Senator, nor do I believe he will do it, to place myself or anybody else in a false attitude. General Sheridan states nothing in that report of his own personal knowledge. He simply makes an official report, like the Senator has often made, of acts which are reported to him, and not upon his own knowledge. Therefore what I said here could not be construed, as the Senator knows, into an attack upon General Sheridan.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that I remember once in the Senate Chamber a Senator rose in his place on the democratic side, on account of one of Sheridan's reports, and said that General Sheridan was not fit to breathe the free air of heaven.

Mr. MAXEY. Who said that?

Mr. LOGAN. It was stated on this floor. It was said in reference to a dispatch that General Sheridan forwarded calling the Ku Klux and White Liners "banditti," as they had committed murders in Louisiana. He made this general report on these deaths, but then in the report that he made to the Secretary of War in reference to murders committed in Louisiana he called the White Liners and Ku Klux Klan "banditti," and he said they were committing murders in violation of law; and on this floor it was said he was not fit to breathe the free air of heaven.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me now to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to be misrepresented, and of course the Senator does not intend to misrepresent me. I have said nothing whatever reflecting upon General Sheridan.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that you had.

Mr. BUTLER. I inferred from the Senator repelling any such imputation that the impression might be created that I had said something reflecting upon General Sheridan. Permit me to say that I have no doubt General Sheridan is a very honorable man; I have not the slightest doubt of it. I want to say further that he is easily imposed upon. I can go into Louisiana, I can go into South Carolina, I can go into Mississippi, and so can the Senator, and get affidavits for a dollar and a half apiece to prove that the Senator was chief of the Ku Klux Klan. I can prove that the Senator was chief of the Ku Klux Klan by affidavits at a dollar and a half apiece.

Mr. LOGAN. You had better undertake it.

Mr. BUTLER. I can do so easily, without the slightest trouble.

Mr. LOGAN. It is very easy for the Senator to say you can prove anything. You do not need any proof when you find one hundred and fifty men lying slaughtered like so many pigs, as was the case at Colfax. Does that require proof?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not discussing that.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator say that affidavits at a dollar and a half apiece proved the fact of these murders when men, women, and children stood aghast at the bleeding corpses that lay there in the court-house yard?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I will state that General Sheridan's report was based on a report made to him by Colonel Forsythe and other officers of his staff, detailed and sent through Louisiana expressly to gather the facts in regard to the alleged massacres there.

Mr. LOGAN. I was just going to say that General Sheridan made the statement on evidence procured by his staff officers. He made his report on these statements. I do not wish to go into this matter at any great length, but the Senator from Georgia (and I am very sorry he is not present) said these outrages had stopped. I saw a moment ago one of the Senators from Florida, and if he is present I will ask him a question. I have been told, and I will give the name, so that Senators can criticise the gentleman——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Are you asking me a question?

Mr. LOGAN. I am asking anybody a question. You spoke about names. Now I am going to give the names. At the last election at Chattahoochee, in Florida, a man by the name of Ketlembeel, a German physician, made a republican speech in that town, and that night they took his mule, the only one he had, and cut its tongue out, and the mule died. Is that an outrage on a dumb beast merely because his master made a republican speech, or is it not?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not believe it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to get through I will state——

Mr. BUTLER. Who cut the tongue out, if the Senator will pardon me?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state another fact. I was told last night by a gentleman from Florida that on the day of the election his son rode a horse to Chattahoochee, and that the democrats took the boy off the horse and said he was the son of a damned Yankee, and cut the mane and tail off from the horse and turned him loose. Is that the way the democrats do?

Mr. CALL. I wish to say a word, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN, (aside.) This is a hornet's nest, is it not? They are swarming, it seems.

Mr. CALL. I take great pleasure in saying to the Senator from Illinois that every statement of outrage or interference with a republican in the State of Florida, either in his private home or upon the stump, is absolutely false. I say to the gentleman and the other Senators upon the opposite side that I can prove by the evidence of respectable republicans that every allegation made against that State in regard to any intimidation or any interference or any want of cordial and generous friendship to republicans is an absolute and a foul lie, and that the evidence could be accumulated mountain high from republicans of respectability and of unimpeached character to that effect. That is my reply.

Mr. LOGAN. I knew that I would rouse the lion of Florida from his lair.

Mr. CALL. I think the Senator will always do that when he asserts what is entirely false with regard to the people of my State.

Mr. LOGAN. I gave the Senator the names, and he can discuss that question with the man who tells me that it is true.

Mr. CALL. I denounce that man in the Senate of the United States as stating what is false.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator and that gentleman can discuss it. These facts were given to me and I give them to you, and these gentlemen can have it out among themselves. I must say there is a great difference of opinion among citizens of Florida on this question. Let me go a little further. I will give another statement that was made to me last night. I believe the insane asylum for Florida is at Chattahoochee, is it not?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir, there is an insane asylum at Chattahoochee.

Mr. LOGAN. This same gentleman told me last night that the doctor who was in charge of that insane asylum, who has been since turned out, brought insane persons to the poll and voted them at the last election. Of course they voted the democratic ticket.

Mr. CALL. If anything of that sort was ever done it was done under the republican administration; it has never been done under the democratic administration of the State.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me I should like to make a suggestion. The next time such a man comes to him to retail stories I suggest to the Senator that he ask him if he is one of those republicans in the South who think it is right to lie for the benefit of their party.

Mr. LOGAN. That is another evidence of genius from the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator knows very well that he has heard witness after witness appear before a committee of the Senate and admit that it was not only right to tell falsehoods but to swear to them for the benefit of the republican party.

Mr. LOGAN. It is the proper way, I suppose, to answer all these charges, whether of record evidence or anything else, to say that somebody may tell a lie. Of course somebody may. I have known democrats who would lie; even as good people as they are. Now, I say to the Senator in all good nature, if there is a man in the Senate Chamber who is endowed with genius he is that man. There is nothing in the world out of which he cannot squirm; it does not make any difference what it is. The other day—I enjoyed the sight very much indeed—I saw the Senator enter that door. He came stepping forward in a majestic manner. On his table was a ship, a large ship, too, all bedecked with flowers of each and every variety.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Did you want it? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I did not. I am going to tell the Senator the reason why it was given to him. It had a base; it stood on wires. I walked around that ship. I thought at first it was the ship of State, but I discovered that it was not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is about as correct as your ideas generally are.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me to get through then he can correct me. I discovered that the ship was a double-ender and had no rudder, and it was without sail. It had a large white flower stuck where the rudder ought to be. I supposed of course, being a ship made for the purpose of complimenting the Senator, that the ship would be modeled to suit him. It being of the character it was, a double-ender, without a rudder, so that it could sail either way in any kind of wind, I thought it was appropriate. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I am entirely satisfied that the Senator from Illinois does not know what a ship is anyway.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps I do not. I am sure I do not know what kind of a ship that was; I am certain of that, but I suppose it was modeled for the purpose of suiting——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You do not build ships.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I do not; if I did build one I would put a rudder to it.

Now, sir, having noticed the Senator from Georgia when his sails are spread and when he thinks he is at the helm, but much mistaken when he undertakes to guide himself across boisterous and deep water, when he sails majestically and beautifully in the direction and course with the wind, I notice that if the wind changes he tacks and sails just as beautifully and majestically in the other direction. [Laughter.] Having noticed that so frequently here, it has caused me to have a great admiration for him, or at least for his sailing qualities.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suppose "a fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind." That is the reason you admire it; you are a little of that style yourself.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say to the Senator that my tacking has not been as frequent.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now quit that nonsense. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Which position?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Everything you have been saying.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say that that which drops from the lips of the great Senator from Georgia falls like great, immense balls of wit always. The Senator is too much of a man to be dropping these idle remarks that everything is nonsense that a man says. That does not suit the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now I ask the Senator from Illinois in all seriousness—I did not mean any harm—does he not think, in all candor, that this whole discussion, as he is reducing it, is very great nonsense? I put it to his honor, does he not think so?

Mr. LOGAN. I will proceed. I think that the discussion is perhaps in accordance with the gentleman who commenced it, the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did not commence it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator thinks this discussion is nonsense, it emanated from him and is part of his nonsense.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts brought that ghost story in here—it was not I—about the gin-house. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I rose, as I said, merely to reply to the Senator in reference to his talk about the refutation of these outrages. When he speaks about the question that has been tendered to him, of course it is not tendered to anybody else, because he is the great leader on that side of the House and he is the Senator who will accept issues and make issues; he is the Senator who will tender issues and accept issues which are tendered to him, and he will do it on behalf of the democratic party—I say that the issue we tender you, and this we do tender you, we tender it from the time the sun rises in the morning until it sets in the evening, in sunlight and in the darkness of night, in the storm and in the brightness of day, that until every man in this country who is a freeman shall have the right to vote for whom he pleases at an election authorized by law, and have his one vote counted—until that time shall come we will stand battling against you on this issue; and that is the issue now tendered.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will you carry that to Massachusetts and Rhode Island as well as to the South?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not see for the life of me how any issue can be made upon a question of that kind.

Mr. GROOME. We are all agreed on that.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator from Illinois entirely in that. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh no, there is no dispute about that. Every man has a right to vote; but you will vote your tissue ballots in South Carolina by the thousand and count them and then say every man is entitled to vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no, Mr. President. The Senator is drawing upon his imagination.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. He is drawing upon his imagination.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I am not. I am drawing on facts.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is giving us now a specimen of his genius. He has been talking about the genius of everybody else, and he is now enlightening the Senate upon what his specimen idea of genius is, and that idea of genius is in talking about tissue ballots in South Carolina.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me to ask him whether or not men have been indicted for those offenses in the courts of that State?

Mr. LOGAN. I shall not yield any further. Senators attempt to ward off these propositions by a kind of game-making. Now, sir, you know, and does not everybody in this country know that tissue ballots were used in South Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. Used when the Senator's friends and the republican governor had charge of that State.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah!

Mr. BUTLER. There was the birth and origin of the tissue ballot; and I heard nothing from the eloquent Senator from Illinois, or from the eloquent Senator from Maine, or from the Senator from Massachusetts about a free ballot and a fair count when their friends were using the tissue ballots—when their friends were trampling the ballot under foot and disgracing civilization. Nothing was heard about "a free ballot and a fair count" then—nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, will the Senator talk about my friends disgracing civilization?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; I do say it.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, sir, I will reply to that. When you throw down that gauntlet, I say for any Senator on that side to rise in his seat and talk about the republican party disgracing civilization——

Mr. BUTLER. I said it exactly.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, you said it.

Mr. BUTLER. And I stick to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Of all the crimes that governments or nations have ever known, that have caused weeping, wailing, and distress in this land, the greatest are the woes that came from the hands of the democratic party.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator be kind enough to indicate anywhere any crime that made human nature weep under democratic government in the South?

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Let the Senator state one.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, sir, I will go on and make my own speech.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but the Senator challenges me to——

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; the Senator has interrupted me time and again, and every other Senator here has.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg his pardon.

Mr. LOGAN. I have yielded to every Senator who has asked me to yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Not to every one.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator yield to me a minute? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. Now, then, I wish to say in conclusion that when Senators talk about republicans, South or North, and about carpet-baggers, we were all carpet-baggers down South once, and many of our friends remained there. From my own State there are but five of the Representatives in the other House to-day who were born in that State. We do not despise people because they were not born in our midst. We do not despise people because once they did not belong to the slave oligarchy of this country. We do not despise people on account of their birth or on account of their race. But it is a well-known fact that the colored republicans in the South, in many States of the South, have not had the opportunity to vote. Everybody knows that. Men stand up here and deny it when the record is full of it, when the evidence is before the country, when everybody knows that to be true, and yet they will stand up here and say that it is false.

This discussion commenced at the time when we came into this Senate Chamber to elect the officers of the Senate. Senators get up and say we are obstructing public business because we desire to elect officers of the Senate. We have a right to do so, a constitutional right, if we have the numbers to elect. You have no right when it comes to the question of constitutional right to oppose it. You have the power, the physical power to resist it, but the right belongs to the majority, and you stand here day after day, day by day resisting the majority of this Senate merely because you desire to retain a few officers in place for a few months. You resist the organization of this Senate; you bring discussion into this Chamber; you commenced the discussion here; you commenced it by your assaults upon the Senator from Virginia; you persist in them; you lug in different things; and when you are answered, when you are replied to, and when things are brought to your own hearthstones, then you get up and deny them and insinuate and undertake to bully men to keep them from stating the truth here on this floor. That is exactly the position of the democratic party in this Chamber to-day, and you talk about the northern people sustaining you. You have talked that way for twenty years. Before this discussion is over I will give some of the Senators an opportunity, for I understand that there is a Senator lying in wait for me now with a speech that I made once when I was a democrat. If that is so, I say read it. I defy any man to show in any speech that I ever made a sentiment uttered contrary to the rights and interests of the Union of these States, and if you have got any speeches of mine hid under your tables bring them out and read them and let them go on record. I am ready.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Now, sir, let me go further.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. LOGAN. I tell you the northern people understand you perfectly well, and they understand us, too. You cannot deceive them. For twenty years you have been mistaken. You were mistaken when you undertook to break up this Union; you were mistaken when you undertook to resist the reconstruction acts; you were mistaken when you undertook to elect a President the first time, and you failed. Then you thought you could do it a second time; you failed. You thought you could do it last fall, and you failed, and you will always fail upon the issues that you tender the republicans of this country. Whenever you insinuate against the Senator from Virginia that he is a repudiator, the northern people who read and understand your record will come back at you, and say the repudiators of Mississippi have no right to throw it in the face of the Senator from Virginia, and the repudiators of South Carolina, if that is the term when they scaled their debt, have no right to throw it in the face of another. Those who scaled the debts in North Carolina had no more right than he had. But the northern men understand this question. The northern people understand these facts. The northern people understand that your States scaled down from $240,000,000 to $84,000,000 the debts they owed to northerners and foreigners. They understand that; and when you denounce us for a coalition with this man from Virginia because you say he is partially a repudiator, we tell you, sweep your own houses before you commence in other people's; we tell you, pay your own debts before you talk about other people; and I say to you the northern people understand this thing perfectly.

Talk about northern repudiators! We have none, sir. Our States pay their debts. The only attempt at repudiation in my State that ever was made was on a test made by a leading democrat. He attacked the debt of Illinois when it was about thirteen million dollars. He was voted down. My State paid every dollar, and to-day it does not owe one cent—not a cent. That is the idea of the northern people, and you cannot deceive them. You cannot deceive them by charging that we have coalesced with this man from Virginia. The people of the North understand this question; they will understand the question, and they will understand it in this way: we do not indorse either one side or the other of the Virginia question; but when a man comes to us and says, "I have drawn the sword; I stand in the front rank, and I invite the cohorts of freedom to follow me to the ballot-box, and there black and white shall have a free vote and a fair count," we republicans say, here is our hand, and we will march to the death with you. That is the proposition, and the northern people understand it, and they will indorse the republicans in standing by these men in the South who will meet you at the ballot-box. If you go with shot-guns they will meet you; as you go they will go. I do not mean that we indorse any such thing as that, but I mean if you undertake to prevent these men from voting it will not be submitted to. They will march to the ballot-box with you. Shot-guns will not stop them, and why? It will be Greek against Greek; it will not be the white man putting his foot upon the colored man's neck; but it will be Greek meeting Greek, and then will come the tug of war. Sir, we encourage it. I agree that we do. I encourage these men of Virginia; I encourage them everywhere. I say, march to the front and lead the whites and the blacks against the Bourbon democracy until freedom shall be recognized everywhere, and until a free ballot and a fair count shall be recognized and shall be had; and in that way the old flag will not be a lie, but it will be what it pretends to be, it will be spreading its folds to cover freedom wherever it is found; and wherever the flag floats freedom will be found also.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not propose to answer the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I desire to say to him that if anybody has any old speech of his under his desk that he wants to read, I am not the man, and I do not think that it will pay to read it. I have read some of his speeches made in old times——

Mr. LOGAN. I expect you have.

Mr. BECK. Before he was as patriotic as he is now under his present ideas of patriotism, and I have read a good many other things that perhaps he would not care to hear and that I would not feel myself very much elevated by reading.

But what I rose to say was that we shall never end this debate as long as we have full galleries for the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who will talk as long as the galleries are full, but by Monday morning so that I may say some things to him confidentially I will endeavor to call attention to this rule:

On a motion made and seconded to close the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy, the presiding officer shall direct the galleries to be cleared; and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain closed.

I think I shall give notice now that about Monday I will make that motion so as to stop the Senator from Massachusetts from making his eloquent harangues to the galleries. I will not make it now. Perhaps I had better give notice of it now; shall I do it in writing so as to be in order? There will be no end of this business as long as these galleries remain full and so many pyrotechnics can be displayed for the edification of the ladies as we have had this afternoon. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. BECK. I will yield, of course——

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. BECK. Oh, no. To please you, I will give way for a question; but I cannot yield the floor; I am just beginning. [Laughter.] I want the Senator from Massachusetts to stay here to-night.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is aware that the galleries are full, I observe. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. Of course I am. I do not propose that the Senator from Massachusetts shall be more gallant than I am. I want him to sit this thing out to-night and see if he cannot elect Mr. Riddleberger, his friend, to-night before he goes, and not propose to adjourn over till Monday or wait till to-morrow at twelve o'clock and then try to force us to a vote. And we will go to the consideration of executive business, after you have done that. I do not see why you should not do it as well to-night as at any other time. You have spent ten days now in pretending that you intended to force us, when you have not intended to do it at all. You dare not go into executive session, and you know it, and there is the trouble, because you would develop such quarrels among yourselves that you would be worse than the Kilkenny cats, and there might be less left of you than of those animals by the time you got through. [Laughter.] We all know that as well as you do, and the country knows it just as well as you do. But as long as you can make a fuss about Louisiana and Mississippi and tissue ballots and things of that kind, and wave the bloody shirt, the thing works admirably to cause delay, to enable you to avoid the issues that you know you will have to meet some day or other, and therefore I want you to make us "sit it out" to-night. We will be with you.

I agree with my friend from Georgia; I believe in the jury system; but for fear you might think that all the virtue was on one side and all the wrongs on the ballot on the other, and that only one side is for a full vote, free ballot, and a fair count, will you be kind enough to allow me to read you some little things that we saw up in Rhode Island. I see my distinguished friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] before me. Last summer a year it was developed by inquiry there that there was no election in that corporation or State, or whatever you like to call it, that was not bought; and one of the most distinguished citizens of that State being under examination, I put this question to him:

Q. There is generally a good deal of money about it when it is done?

The answer was from a man who had been a worker in these things:

A. There is no election here without the use of money. There would not be an election in Rhode Island, in fact, without money, any more than a funeral without a corpse.

They spent $133,000 on one side, he says, and $73,000 on the other at a celebrated election where less than 25,000 votes were cast, all told; and the rule was when a fellow voted he had to go into a dark room with a little ticket, sometimes called "goose," sometimes "soup ticket," sometimes called by one name and sometimes another, but each ticket had its value, and when it went up to the ceiling of the barn the value came down. Let me read the testimony on this point of a man who was editor of a paper, who had been a candidate for lieutenant-governor, who was a very distinguished man. This is the way in which they operated up there for a free ballot, a full vote, and a fair count; no money, not a straw to be thrown in the way of a man, a priceless vote!

I went down, knowing nothing of what was up or what was meant. There were two or three went down. The ward-room was on Summer street. I went down Summer street. He turned into a lane and went down by a store toward a barn. I asked him, "What's up?" Said he, "You'll find out." He went along to the barn, and "Well," said I, "this is funny;" but I think I remarked to him, "I guess I'll see the end of it now." We went into the barn. There was an aperture in the floor overhead about six inches square. As he went into the barn he handed me a card. Said he, "Hand that up to the hole." I handed it up to the hole and received an envelope. There were three or four others who received envelopes immediately after. I put the envelope in my pocket and went off about my business. I think I went up to the ward-room. I got home. I took the envelope and opened it, and there was a ten-dollar bill. I told my wife that somehow or other I had a windfall; she might have that, and I gave it to my wife.

He went on to describe that that was the rule, not the exception, in that grand old Commonwealth of Rhode Island, according to all the testimony given by men of all parties, and nobody denied it. It was said to be regarded as somewhat disgraceful for a man to vote unless he was paid for the vote he gave. It was proven, too, that the poor man who paid no taxes could not vote until his poll tax was paid, his dollar, while the man who owned real estate could vote whether he paid or not, because they said his real estate was bound for it; and there were men who had served in the Army of the United States, who were born in foreign countries, who were told that if they went into the Army they would have a right to vote; and yet after they came back they testified before us that though they might have been members of Congress, though they might have been lieutenant-governors, and though they had held high positions, because they did not own real estate in Rhode Island, they, being foreign-born citizens, though naturalized, could not vote at all. In that State 40 per cent. of the population is deprived of the right of suffrage. This was the testimony taken before the committee of which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was chairman. The late Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Wallace) was also chairman of another committee which investigated affairs there, and many men came before him and said that corruption was the rule and not the exception, and that men could not vote unless they owned real estate, in a State where there was hardly any real estate to own.

In the State of Massachusetts we had another investigation, and this was the way in which they illustrated the notion of a free ballot and a fair count, an honest vote, "priceless suffrage"—I believe that is the word used. I will give only an illustration; I do not propose to occupy the whole night about it. I will take the case of the Manchaug Manufacturing Corporation, in the county of Worcester, Massachusetts. Mr. Wallace, in his report to the Senate, said:

The selectmen of the town have charge of the ballot-box on election day. McArthur, an employé of the company, was in charge as such in 1878. Chase and Knox, two other employés of the company, were in attendance. The workmen were provided with republican tickets at the works, hauled in wagons to the polling place, and voted under the direct supervision of McArthur, Chase, and Knox. A witness describes the process thus:

"My attention was called to the peculiar way they had of managing the voters there. I stepped up to the little railing that they had there to go around and up to the polls and I saw two men stationed at the entrance where the voters went in. One was a Mr. Chase, and the other was a Mr. Knox. I saw that the help of the village"—

"The help of the village" meant the employés of the manufacturing establishment. "Help" is a milder word—

"(I was acquainted with a great portion of them) came along in a sort of rotation. Mr. Chase was on one side and this Mr. Knox was on the other, and as each man came up they would take hold of the ticket the man had, and say, 'That is right, pass on.' Another would come up, and they would say, 'That is right, pass on.' Another would come up, and they would say, 'Hold on, that is not the vote you want to cast.' 'Why, yes it is the vote I want to cast.' 'No, it is not.' 'Why certainly this is my vote.' 'Oh, no;' and he got it out of the man's hand, tore it up, and threw it on the floor. He said, 'You do not want to vote such a damned vote as that.' He then handed the voter another one. The man then remarked, 'I don't want to cast this vote.' The reply was, 'Go right along; that is the vote you want.' The man went right along and put it in the box."

Mr. FARLEY. Where was that?

Mr. BECK. In Massachusetts, illustrating a "free ballot and a fair count," "priceless suffrage!"

"Mr. Hastings, the constable, stood right opposite, and I stood, perhaps, four feet from this Mr Knox."

Another instance is given thus:

Q. Who was at the polls to receive the employés in November last?
A. Mr. Chase.
Q. Is he connected with the corporation?
A. He is the bookkeeper there.
Q. Who takes them from the mills to the poll?
A. The teams of the corporation take them.
Q. What have you seen in regard to tickets when they have got to the polls?
A. I have seen Mr. Chase change their tickets. He generally stands at one side there where there is a small place to go through, and, as they come along, he always has the ballots there, and I have seen him change them, and have seen them get tickets from him and carry them in.
Q. The specific tickets you speak of, did they examine those?
A. I do not know whether they could or not. Pretty nearly all of those who work there are French, and I do not know whether they could examine them.
Q. Do you know whether those tickets were in envelopes or open?
A. I have seen Mr. Chase give tickets to them that were open.
Q. Did you see this occur in November, 1878?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Specify an instance and describe how this occurred, if you can.
A. As they passed along he was standing there on this side, and as they would come up to the polls he would stop them, hand them one of the tickets, and say, "Here, carry it in." They might have had an envelope or something of that kind. I have seen them have envelopes. I have seen that occur.

And the committee went on to develop the fact that over and over again at different places these things occurred. I do not want to tell these things to the galleries—they may get to the ears of the American people—for fear somebody will think there was not a full vote, a free ballot, and a fair count. Here are three reports—report No. 303, made by Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress; report No. 497, made to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress by Mr. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, and report No. 572 made also to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress by Mr. Wallace—in which there is so much learning that will edify gentlemen on the other side in regard to a free ballot at the other end of the country, that in order to give them time to look into it by Monday morning——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that the evidence in regard to those villages—Manchaug is a village I know very well, close to my own city—was contradicted through and through before that committee by democratic witnesses; and I state on my personal responsibility that any claim made anywhere that there is not a free vote in those villages, and that the democrats do not vote as freely as the republicans, and did not then, would be laughed to scorn by the democrats of those places. It is an utterly ridiculous, absurd, and contemptible slander, so I say.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, that report was made by a majority of the Senators on this floor composing the committee, Senator McDonald, of Indiana, being one, Senator Wallace, of Pennsylvania, being another. The evidence is all here in the document to which I have referred. So far from the statements being laughed at, men would be laughed at who would contradict them, no matter what personal responsibility contradicts them. I have furnished the evidence. Here it is. I have only read a small portion of it.

Mr. HOAR. It is contradicted by democrats. You will find it all there.

Mr. BECK. It was alleged before the committee and proven to be true, and is sustained upon this floor by evidence so much higher than that upon which the southern people are charged with fraud, that there is no comparison between the weight of testimony on the two sides. I heard ten years ago of these charges of fraud made against the southern people. I was of the committee of twenty-one that went into the Southern States and made the great investigation of 1871. We proved every one of those men who came and said that they could not give in their names for fear of injury to them at home to be not only absolutely false, but we made many of them admit the falsehood themselves; and though we were in a minority of less than a third I believe in either House, when the report was made—and I wrote the minority report myself, aided by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD]—though there were thirteen volumes of testimony taken, with all that overwhelming majority, we so overwhelmed them with the truth that that republican Congress never dared to pass a bill to vindicate the correctness of that which had been alleged. On the contrary, the Senators who made these reports as to Rhode Island and Massachusetts stood in their places on this floor to vindicate them, and furnished the evidence; and here it is.

Now, Mr. President, all I mean by this is, that if you want to go out from the business before the Senate for which the President has called us together in executive session, and we are to pick up all these things North and South, we have an endless job, without any power to do anything except to criminate and recriminate each other on both sides and make the American people hold both sides in contempt for failing to do the work we were called to do and seeking to bring up old issues and see which can say the most bitter things against the other. As I have not taken any part in that line and do not propose to do it, I have merely made suggestions from these voluminous reports which I hold in my hand to show what could be said at the other end of the Union as against the attack made on the southern end. It seems to me that we had better quit all these things, if we ever intend to get away from here, and go to the business that is before us—proceed to the consideration of executive business and adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am a very humble member of the opposition here, and having contributed little and perhaps nothing to the literature that is now being so spread upon our RECORD, I would be glad if I could to find myself in order to ask that an article be read from one of the leading republican papers of Philadelphia. It seems like a response to the powerful eloquence of the Senator from Massachusetts, to say nothing of the eloquence of the Senator from Pennsylvania himself. If I have the floor, if I am in order in any way, I should like to ask the Chief Clerk, Colonel Shober, to read this article.

Mr. MORRILL. Can it not go over until to-morrow?

Mr. VOORHEES. No; I think we might as well wind it up to-night. We shall sleep better on it. These are republican suggestions, not democratic dictation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

AN IMPOSING SPECTACLE.

For several days past the Senate of the United States has presented the spectacle of the foremost legislative body of the country prosecuting a contest for the control of three or four comparatively insignificant offices. During the time that this absorbing question has been before it the Senate has set aside all public business, neglected the work which it was convened to do, and given itself up to a wrangle as unseemly as it is unprofitable. On Saturday, after an adjournment had been effected, the republican members assembled in caucus and resolved to continue the contest indefinitely, or until their opponents should surrender from sheer exhaustion.

The Senate itself, as is known, is equally divided politically, but the republicans having with them the presiding officer, the Vice-President of the United States, and a renegade democrat and debt-repudiator from Virginia, MAHONE, have a bare majority. Without either of them the Senate would be a tie; without both of them the democrats would have a majority.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I object to the reading.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought you would.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Indiana will not, on reflection, think he can have read a newspaper article which applies an epithet to a member of this body which he would not himself apply.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will indorse these as my remarks now; I make them.

Mr. HOAR. I call the Senator to order, then.

Mr. VOORHEES. If I have the floor, those are my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that the application of the word "renegade" to another member of this body is out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, I will apologize for that, and then go on. Read on.

Mr. HOAR. I raise the point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want the article read. It is from a republican paper, one of the leading republican papers of Pennsylvania. I am not to be initiated into the courtesies that prevail in republican journalism, but I want this read, and I will apologize for very much that is in it——

Mr. HOAR. I ask the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that the phrase "renegade democrat" applied to a member of this body is a breach of its order.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then skip that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator adopting that himself cannot proceed without leave. I demand the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. VOORHEES. I asked leave of the Senate to have it read. I will skip that part to which the Senator objects.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the point of order is not well taken. There have been worse things read here time and again from the testimony of witnesses, and I do not think the rules apply to a case of that kind.

Mr. HOAR. I raise the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken. Senators themselves, within the limits of propriety, must be the judge of the epithets they will employ and the articles they will read or have read.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am obliged to the Chair. Let the Clerk go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is under no obligation to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

The offices which are the matter of contention are senatorial, such as Secretary, a Sergeant-at-Arms, clerks, &c. Most of these offices are now held by democrats, elected when the democrats had an effective preponderance of votes. It is not contended that they do not discharge in a perfectly efficient and satisfactory manner their respective duties; but the republicans, having the majority, composed as before stated, demand that they shall have the offices also. This claim is in precise accordance with political usage, and if it were made by a New York board of aldermen, chosen generally from the scums, or by Philadelphia's common council, would pass without comment; but it is made and contended for, to the disregard of all matters of national interest, by the most elevated legislative body in the land, to the very great discredit of that body and the general humiliation of the country.

Under ordinary circumstances, it is probable that the democrats would be as likely to recognize and submit to a majority of one as of one hundred; but the present circumstances are most extraordinary. Admitting that it is right and becoming for the Vice-President of the United States to join in a miserable squabble of this kind for the control of less than a half dozen petty offices, which we believe all right-thinking people will declare it is not, the democrats have a certain equitable right to insist upon the retention of the present efficient officers elected by them, because of the appearance of Senator MAHONE upon the side of the opposition. A Senator is chosen to represent in the Senate the wishes and opinions of his constituents, and not his own wishes or opinions, or, particularly, not his own private and material interests. Mr. MAHONE was chosen Senator from Virginia by democrats, as a democrat; also as a repudiator of the public debt honestly owed by Virginia to her creditors, who loaned her every dollar represented by the amount of the debt which Mr. MAHONE organized a party to repudiate. If the democrats like that sort of a democrat, they should be welcome to him; but the republicans, "the party of moral ideas," the party pledged to an honest payment of all public debts, should not have him if they could get him for nothing, much less should they have him by buying him, directly or indirectly. That he is sitting on the republican benches in consequence of a bargain-and-sale arrangement, no intelligent republican or democrat pretends to deny. The evidence to that point is all too clear, and, we must regretfully add, all too disgraceful.

On the day after he cast his first vote with the republicans he was rewarded by the President of the United States with an ostentatious gift of flowers from the Government conservatory, and on following days he was rewarded by the same high official with the gift to one of his henchmen, a democrat, of the postmastership of Richmond, and the collectorship of the Alexandria custom-house to another henchman, also a democrat. By the republicans of the Senate he was rewarded by the gift of the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, and it is to consummate this gift to the Senator who has led a State to repudiate its debts, and who has betrayed his constituents, that the Senate is wrangling and neglecting public business. The democrats may justly say that they are justified in protesting against and opposing any such contract, and it is to the abiding shame and dishonor of the republican party that there is not a single one of its Senators who is wise and honest enough to also oppose it; for, as Senator CALL said on Saturday, those who did not oppose it, republican or democrat, "became parties to the commencement of a practice the effect of which might be to substitute mercenary and venal considerations for the just and unbiased judgment of the Senate."

We have called the spectacle of the highest executive officer of the Republic strewing the path of the Virginia repudiator and renegade with flowers and offices, and of the Senate of the United States prosecuting a prolonged and exciting contest in order to compensate him for his vote with official patronage, an imposing spectacle. It is not that; on the contrary, it is a spectacle as disgraceful as the country has for a long time been required to contemplate. It is derogatory to the dignity of all concerned in it, and as derogatory to the credit of the country. However desirable, and even essential, it is that the republicans should hold control of the Senate, the price that has been paid to obtain it is too high, for it involves the surrender of the most cherished republican principles.

Mr. DAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I will delay the Senate but a minute, because I know that we are all tired and want to go home.

Mr. FARLEY. I think there is a good deal in the article just read, and I want to know what paper it was that published that article.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg to say it was the Evening Telegraph of Philadelphia, of Monday last, and according to a letter which I hold in my hand, written by a gentleman whom I know well and have known long, it is one of the leading republican daily papers of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, within a very few days Rhode Island has received a vindication in this Chamber from the senior Senator from the State, [Mr. ANTHONY,] which we are all willing to rest upon. We propose to manage our own affairs in our own way. We pass laws and obey them. The republican party in Rhode Island is very largely in the majority, and as a rule all the contests in the State are between republicans. We have bad men in our State in both parties, as is the case in all the States of the Union. Often when two republicans get into a political contest each strives to win democratic votes. Doubtless votes of corrupt men have been purchased. It was given in evidence before one of the committees referred to by the Senator from Kentucky that the principal part of the purchasable element of the State of Rhode Island is in the democratic party. I make no such charge. In fact I deny that any considerable portion of our citizens are corrupt in the exercise of the elective franchise. We are an old community, and like all such we have our native political excrescences. The proportion of foreign population to native-born is greater than in any other State in the Union; and while I desire to say nothing against that portion of our people, it is but fair to say that they do not equal the natives of the State in their knowledge and appreciation of our institutions for the simple reason that they are not familiar with them.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to proceed a moment longer. He has read the evidence of one man, a Mr. Foster, given before the Butler committee. The Mr. Foster to whom he refers as having testified that he sold his vote was the greenback candidate for lieutenant-governor of the State; and I think his financial views are to a considerable extent in accord with those of the Senator from Kentucky. I do not mean to call the Senator from Kentucky a full-fledged greenbacker, but I mean to say that the witness Foster, whose evidence he quotes, belongs to that class of our citizens who are rather in accord with the Senator from Kentucky upon financial questions.

Mr. President, the people of Rhode Island are equal in integrity to any people on the face of the earth in the conduct of their affairs, both public and private. They are law-abiding; their elections are conducted without disorder or riot and with the utmost possible fairness.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to ask the Senator whether he does not think the foreign-born population living in Rhode Island is quite equal in intelligence to the negroes of Mississippi and South Carolina?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, Mr. President, I think they are superior. I am not going to be drawn into making any such comparisons, or into any disparagement of our foreign population. Many of them are possessed of great intelligence and skill in their callings. They are with us, and are growing very rapidly in knowledge of our institutions, their children going to our schools, and are making good citizens. But I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that I believe our suffrage laws are good as applied to our State with all attending circumstances. I was at one time a free-suffrage man; I disbelieved in the propriety of having a registry tax for all non-taxpayers; I disbelieved in the propriety of having a real-estate qualification for foreign-born citizens; but I believe now that our present system is the wisest possible one for us to pursue in view of all our surroundings. I would be glad to see all foreign-born citizens who belonged to the Union army fully enfranchised in our State.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ROLLINS. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island and also of the Senator from Kentucky to an important fact which was developed by the committee which investigated the Rhode Island elections, one very important fact to my mind, which is, that there was on the occasion of two elections quite a large expenditure of money, and the result in each of those elections was the success of the opposing candidate to the regular republican party. In the first instance a square-toed democrat was elected by the expenditure of money, and in the second instance the opponent of the regular candidate of the republican party was elected. Those were the men who expended the money. That was proved over and over again before that committee.

Mr. BECK. Let me say one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has been recognized by the Chair, and yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island and then to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BECK. Just allow me to say one word in reply to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from New Hampshire. Perhaps the fact he states was proved, and it shows how venal those two men were, and that an overwhelming republican majority could be counted into a minority, and a minority man could be elected if he used money freely enough, as happened to be done on those two occasions. Those were instances where the full vote, the free ballot, and the honest count did not quite come in.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, the gentlemen come here to talk about their purity and to announce to the world the fact that they never spend any money in elections, when it is a notorious fact, and has been demonstrated in Rhode Island, that this same democratic party was the first party to inaugurate the system of buying votes, and that it pursued it later and continued it to the election of another man in opposition to the regular republican candidate.

Mr. BECK. But it shows that you have men who can be bought and are bought and a majority converted into a minority, not by a full vote, a free ballot, and an honest count, but by the expenditure of money.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Kentucky was condemning the expenditure of money; and it is at the door of his party that lies the charge that they were the men who inaugurated the expenditure of money in large sums; and what is true of Rhode Island is true of New Hampshire, for in that State the democratic party were the first to inaugurate the system. In the campaign of last fall they did in New Hampshire just what I predicted they would do. They nominated as their candidate for governor a man because he would pour out from his "barrel" more money than any other man in the State could contribute. They nominated him for the purpose of expending money, and then they come here and stand on the floor of the Senate and prate about their honesty and talk about their not spending money!

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, we do not talk about that.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, you are the very men——

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope my good friend from Massachusetts will allow me to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say that I desire to address myself to the amiable side of the Senator from Massachusetts—and I know he has an amiable side—in order to interpose a little republican opinion upon the imbroglio in which we are now engaged. I think it will tend largely to clear up the situation. If he will allow me I will ask to have read an editorial from one of the leading republican newspapers of the United States upon the conflict in which he and I unfortunately find ourselves engaged.

Mr. DAWES. What is the paper?

Mr. VOORHEES. The New York Times of March 15, not very late. It tells some truths. I would not pretend to ask for the reading of anything from a democratic paper; I would not expect the other side to believe it or to listen to it. I ask them hopefully to listen to a few suggestions, and if they do not believe in them the reading of them will do no harm; it may do some good. I ask the Chief Clerk to read this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana for the purpose indicated?

Mr. VOORHEES. I can have it read to-morrow if you do not allow it now.

Mr. DAWES. The Senators on the other side do not treat the New York Times very fairly. This picking out of parts of editorials and writing them out on a sheet of paper does not look just right. The Senator from Kentucky never came so near being unfair in his life as he did a few days ago when he picked out part of an editorial from the New York Times and had it read here. If the Senator from Indiana insists upon it, he cannot appeal to my courtesy and have me refuse him. If the Senator does not insist——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana insist on the request?

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, yes; I should be very glad, because this is good literature.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to the Senator long enough for that.

Mr. VOORHEES. This is republican literature, and I am very anxious to contribute to the richness of this debate, and I do not know how I can do it better than from republican sources. I ask that the article I send to the desk be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On the other hand, it cannot be forgotten that the particular doctrine on which General MAHONE has secured his success in Virginia is one with which republicans can have no possible sympathy. The integrity of the suffrage is no more a cardinal republican principle than is the inviolability of the public credit. General MAHONE has made his fight in his State professedly on the issue of repudiation. If his present co-operation with the republicans involves the use of patronage in Virginia to promote that doctrine, it will be very dearly bought. The party cannot sustain the public faith in the nation and nurse repudiation in a State.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky seems to have left. I was about to say, and I wanted the Senator from Kentucky to hear it, that this discussion did not commence on this side of the Chamber. The Senator from Kentucky has announced that he is tired of it, and threatens that unless it is stopped he will drive the American people out of the galleries and turn off the lights, and he proceeded as far as he was able to execute his own order. I wish to say to him that it will not do. He cannot keep this discussion from the American people by driving them out of these galleries. They have their eyes upon us and their ears are open to us, and they understand what all this means. I beg the Senator to give over the vain notion that this discussion, having been aroused on his side, can be put down in any other way than by proceeding to the public business in order and submitting to what the majority of the Senate shall determine. I move, Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. I yield.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say that I was not at all seeking to make any personally unkind issue upon anybody in this Chamber—nothing was further from my nature or my thoughts—in having had read a somewhat lengthy article from a leading paper in the interest of the republican party in Pennsylvania. If there is anything there impinging upon any gentleman's sense of honor in this Chamber, as there may be upon the presiding officer, the Vice-President of the United States, which I thought possibly needed a disclaimer before I had it read, I desire to say that it has no indorsement from me in the way of making a personal attack.

I expect to present my views and my sentiments with all frankness, but without the slightest desire to reflect upon anybody else who may wish to present his in his own way. And if there is anything in that article—it did not occur to me that there was—to which anybody in this Chamber could except as of an unpleasant character—possibly the presiding officer could—of course it has no indorsement from me.

On the other hand, however, I produced it here as a response from what I conceived to be the strongest and best element of the republican party to the appeal which has been thus far made in favor of controlling a few offices here at the expense of the public business; and I heartily believe that the judgment of the country will go in the same direction, and that at last that side of the Chamber will have to submit that at this time it is not opportune or right to change the officers of this body, that it is contrary to the traditions of the Senate; and if it was not for fear of being charged with treason, I might say that we will stay here as long as you will on that subject.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I have just listened with some gratification to the Senator from Indiana, and I rise now to ascertain whether I correctly understand the Senator. He had previously sent to the desk to be read an article from a Philadelphia paper, which I understood him to say was his speech. In that article I am referred to as a renegade democrat; further on as a repudiationist; and further on, if I remember correctly what is said in the article, it is stated that I had engaged in a bargain with gentlemen representing the republican party on this floor in respect to its organization. Now, if I have recited correctly what is stated in that article, I rise to ask the Senator whether that is his speech, and I pause for a reply.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I sent to that table an article from a leading republican newspaper edited by the allies of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] came to me with that kindly relation which we have ever borne, and asked me to soften that article by disclaiming that it was my speech. I did so in response to that inquiry. If the Senator from Virginia expects anything further than that from me, he is mistaken; he is entirely mistaken. He will have to deal with the republican editor who edits that paper; and when he settles with him, if he has anything further to settle with me, he will find me here; he will find me not only here, but ready to respond. I do not mean that in any offensive sense whatever, but in a sense of absolute justice.

If the Senator from Virginia so early in this contest as now is complaining of the terms in which his republican allies in the newspapers speak of him, complaining of democratic Senators who simply ask that the terms in which he is spoken of by his republican friends may be known, he has a rougher road to travel than he has conceived of. He need not think for one moment that he can coerce or dictate the course of debate on this floor. I gave a large concession, and I did it from my heart, and with no possible disrespect to the Senator from Virginia—not the slightest. I did it because I thought it was right, when the distinguished and cultured Senator from Massachusetts called my attention to it. But if the Senator from Virginia supposes that he can trench one hair's breadth from the understanding between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, and coerce me into a single concession beyond that, he is entirely mistaken.

I am just on this floor, Mr. President, and I intend to be just; but when I send to that desk to have read an editorial from one of the leading republican newspapers of the United States, am I to be called in question on that side of the Chamber? No, sir; no, sir. The Senator from Massachusetts has had my admiration for twenty years, and he knows not for my life would I do an act of injustice, neither would I do an act dictated to me in the spirit in which the Senator from Virginia now rises here.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me only one moment at this time, I desire to say that the paper from which the quotation has been made is, if a republican paper, a republican paper with democratic tendencies, and more frequently democratic tendencies than republican. I understand that the editors of that paper may be republicans——

Mr. VOORHEES. They are.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know in fact as to that; it may be so; but I do know that the statement made by the Senator from Indiana is not correct when he says that it is recognized and known as a leading republican paper in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to make one statement before he proceeds? After the Senator from Indiana had closed his speech I took of my own motion, without anybody's suggestion whatever, the liberty to go to him and to say to him that, while it was no affair of mine in the least, that article seemed to me to contain a personality in regard to one of the Senators and to ask him to consider whether he had desired to adopt that as a part of his speech.

The Senator from Indiana with great promptness, as soon as he could get the floor, rose and said that the fact had been called to his attention that the article contained a personality, and that that personality he desired to withdraw and not to treat as part of his speech any longer.

Mr. VOORHEES. And then the Senator from Virginia rose here to catechise me beyond that. That effort will not be successful.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator from Virginia heard fully the statement that the Senator from Indiana made.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, it is a very simple question. I stated the case to this Senate, I think clearly. I have stated that the Senator from Indiana had read to this House an article from a newspaper in which certain references to myself were made, the Senator having stated that that article was a part of his speech. Now, sir, what I have risen for, notwithstanding what the Senator has said to my friend the Senator from Massachusetts on the left, is to ask the Senator from Indiana whether or not he intended those personal references to me as of his own accord? That is the position; and that is the question I ask the Senator now.

The Senator has said that he does not mean to be dictated to, and that in the course of this debate the privilege will be exercised here of reading at the desk newspaper articles. Mr. President, I make no objection to that, none whatever; it is not that of which I complain; but when the Senator says that that is his speech, then he stands in the attitude of the man who wrote the article. The Senator also takes the liberty of referring me to the newspaper man for settlement. Now, sir, I shall select my own course in that particular.

Mr. VOORHEES. Select it whenever you please.

Mr. MAHONE. I will select you now. I have called on you in this House to say whether or not——

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I indorse every single word that was said in that article, every word.

Mr. MAHONE. I say then the references which you make to me are such as no honorable or brave man would make. I denounce you, sir, as such.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a pure question of here and hereafter.

Mr. MAHONE. Hereafter will come just as soon as you like.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know exactly how to meet that. I indorse every word that was said in that article. I indorse the term "renegade democrat." I indorse everything else that may be construed as reflecting upon the course of the Senator from Virginia. And without his taking his time to put words back upon me, he can seek his redress. There is no use of making any mistakes about this matter at all. I heard the Senator from Virginia stand here and shout out that certain things had to stop. Suppose they don't? I know that they won't, with me, by your dictation. Suppose they don't, what then? That is cheap, very cheap. Let it rest there.

Mr. MAHONE. It is very cheap, Mr. President, to deal in such bravado as the Senator from Indiana here indulges in. But when the gentleman says that he indorses the sentiments of that newspaper, I undertake to characterize them here as such statements as no brave or honorable man would make in this Chamber. Now, let him take that and wear it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the motion I am about to make——

Mr. VOORHEES. As to the wearing of brands and such things, that will depend on "hereafter."

Mr. CONKLING. Is this in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been endeavoring to preserve order, but the rules of order must be largely enforced by members of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to say, Mr. President, that the motion I am going to make is one that has no reference to the divisions between us here in the Senate, and arises from a common feeling of courtesy which I know all sides of the Senate will be very glad to cherish toward another, if not among themselves. I trust, therefore, there will be no opposition to a motion that the Senate do now adjourn until twelve o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that motion will not prevail. We came here to transact executive business; we were called here by the proclamation of the President for that purpose, and I am in favor of remaining here and attending to that business to-morrow. I therefore move that the Senate now go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to say that he must know why I make my motion. It is not out of any disposition to try the endurance of the Senators on that side or on our own. It has reference to another matter, of which the Senator cannot be ignorant. I appeal to the courtesy of the Senator on this occasion. If the Senator does not desire to extend that courtesy I am quite sure that this side of the Senate is ready to meet here to-morrow. I trust that the Senator will not object. I shall withdraw the motion if it is objected to seriously.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would not object to extending courtesy to the Vice-President, to be plain about it. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall elect a President pro tempore for to-morrow and let us go on. Let us have sessions here every day and keep them up until late at night until we get through with this business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware insist on his motion?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will suspend the call. The Chair was not aware at the time when this motion was put that a motion to adjourn to a day certain has precedence. The sense of the Senate must first be taken on that motion. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock. Senators in the affirmative will say "ay;" in the negative, "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] and therefore decline to vote.

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am still paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) Upon this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. WALKER, (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. GROOME, (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If my colleague were here and unpaired, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS, (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called.) The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. PENDLETON, (when his name was called.) Upon this question and all others this evening I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] with the distinct understanding that I may vote if my vote shall be necessary to make a quorum. I withhold my vote until the fact of the presence or absence of a quorum is disclosed.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps it would be well to announce that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained at home by reason of serious illness, and is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. VOORHEES, (after having voted in the negative.) It escaped my recollection that I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER,] and consequently I withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted, the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. HAMPTON. If no quorum has voted, I have a right to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As no quorum has voted, I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the same circumstances, I have a right to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS. I vote "yea," in pursuance of the understanding of my pair.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And I vote "yea" for the same reason.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Blair,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Miller,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

Cockrell,	Johnston,	Sawyer,
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Florida,	Sewell,
Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,	Sherman,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

MONDAY, April 4, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of Friday last, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON and Mr. PENDLETON addressed the Chair.

Mr. PENDLETON. I was going to move to go into executive session.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield for that motion.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Ohio will refrain from the usual motion of delay and let us proceed to the pending question.

Mr. PENDLETON. It was in order that we might not have delay that I have induced my friend from Virginia to yield to me a moment that I may move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. May not the Senator appeal to the Senator from Virginia to yield further to the public business and let us dispose of the pending question?

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide as to the result.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAIR, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MILLER,] who is not here.

Mr. TELLER, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Colorado, was called.) My colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when the name of Mr. INGALLS was called.) The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] it being a transfer of the pair of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] I vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I was paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] but that pair has for this day been transferred to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who is unwell and could not be here. I vote "nay."

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted, forgetting that I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FAIR.] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent from the Senate and his pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] still continues. I announce that for the day.

Mr. HARRIS. The pair has been transferred to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (after having voted in the negative.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent this morning, having been detained from the Senate, and in view of his absence I pair with him and withdraw my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask if the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is recorded as voting. I am paired with him generally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine voted in the negative.

Mr. LAMAR. My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is detained at his room by indisposition. On questions similar to this hereafter he will be paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard.	Coke,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Butler,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Slater.
Camden,	Harris,	Maxey,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Dawes,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Sewell,
Blair,	Ferry,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Burnside,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Morrill,	Van Wyck.
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Platt of Conn.,
Conger,	Hawley,	Rollins,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Saunders,

ABSENT—21.

Davis of Illinois,	Groome,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Walker,
Fair,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,	Williams.
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Garland,	Kellogg,	Vance,
George,	McMillan,	Vest,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I hope now, as the Senator from Ohio sees that there is a decided majority of the Senate insisting upon proceeding with the pending business, that he will feel it his duty to let the Senate take a vote on the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table, as a means of disposing of it.

Mr. CONKLING. That cuts off debate.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I will withdraw the motion if any Senator desires to occupy the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee withdraw the motion?

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise that the Senator from Tennessee will not yield to so decided a majority as has just expressed itself.

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is withdrawn, the Senator from Tennessee will state to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, before proceeding to say anything in regard to the merits of the question now before the Senate I must be permitted to express my warmest and sincerest thanks to my colleague [Mr. MAHONE] for a portion at least of the speech which he made a few days since.

By way of reproach or censure upon me my colleague read a letter which I wrote in the year 1869 to the then governor of Virginia, Governor Walker, and he had the greater portion of it spread upon the RECORD. It only showed that I was the pioneer in Virginia in counseling the restoration of the State to her place in the United States and in giving the colored race every means of making themselves good citizens; that some measures should be taken which would effect a real and just reconstruction in the Union. I hardly think that these sentiments will now be thought censurable by anybody, much less by the republicans of the Senate. At that time the thirteenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth amendments had been adopted, and I stated then that the whole Constitution of the United States should be supported, and for this my colleague makes an attack upon me for what he calls my Bourbonism, and upon the party to which I belong.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. I advocated in that letter the education of the colored people, and I have adhered to the same thing on every occasion since when I have had an opportunity to do so, and I say it now. I will read what I said then, in order that there may be no doubt about my sentiments either then or now. When speaking of the fifteenth amendment I said:

> I entirely approve of the principles of that amendment, and as we have invested the freedman with the right to vote, let us give him a fair opportunity to vote understandingly. He has civil rights, and it is our interest he should know their value.

In the month of October, 1869, I put upon paper the statement that it was right that the colored people of the South, having acquired civil rights, should be educated to know their value; that they should be protected in the exercise of those rights and be made good citizens. The welfare of both races demanded that.

A good deal has been said here about the politics of Mr. Riddleberger and of my colleague. Mr. Riddleberger edits a paper in Virginia called the Virginian, and I suppose neither he nor any one advocating him here would object to my reading a little from that paper to show what his sentiments were and what he advocated. I have here his paper of the 15th of October last. It is "The Virginian;" "H. H. Riddleberger, editor-in-chief."

For President:
Winfield S. Hancock, of Pennsylvania.
For Vice-President:
William H. English, of Indiana.
Electors at large:
Colonel William E. Cameron, of Petersburgh,
Captain H. H. Riddleberger, of Shenandoah.

This number of the paper was issued after the elections in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and I wish to read what Mr. Riddleberger said at that time in regard to those elections:

The news from Indiana and Ohio is of a character to sicken the stoutest heart. In 1876 the democrats carried Indiana in the elections of October and November, and we were illy prepared to expect less at this time, when the presidential candidate is a military man personally endeared to and trusted by all the people of the North and West.

On the 15th of October he declared that the defeat of the democratic party in the States of Indiana and Ohio was enough to sicken the stoutest hearts. In a subsequent issue of the paper, a short time after, on the 26th of November, 1880, this is the way in which he speaks of my colleague:

We can tell these funders, Bourbons, and brokers positively that General MAHONE is a democrat—more, he is a Virginian, intus et in cute. Further, he is a southerner. But above all, he is an American and a patriot. He is not a broker's man: he is not a funder; he is not a Bourbon.

The Riddleberger bill having become a factor in this controversy, I desire to say something in regard to some of its features. In the first place I will read a part of the preamble of the bill, which is entitled "a bill to re-establish the public credit:"

Whereas it is confidently believed that the people of this State will never acquiesce in any settlement which shall obligate them and their posterity to pay any part of the interest upon the public debt which accrued during the war and the period of reconstruction.

Observe that as a part of the bill itself and as a justification for throwing off the interest of a just debt for nine or ten years it assigns the pendency of the war and the passage of the reconstruction measures. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] announced two or three days ago on the floor of the Senate what the reconstruction measures were. He said they consisted of the thirteenth amendment, which manumitted the slaves, the fourteenth amendment, which declared the sancity of the public debt, and the fifteenth amendment, which gave the freedmen the right of suffrage. The Senator and the party to which he belongs consider these measures a second Declaration of Independence, a second Magna Charta—laying anew broad and deep the foundations of civil liberty; and we find them now supporting a man for an office who says in the bill which he prepared that the adoption of those measures by the Congress of the United States and by the people of the country were equal in their terrible, disastrous effects to the war itself, and equally exonerated the people of the State of Virginia from paying interest upon its debt. The Riddleberger bill makes announcement of two things which have occurred which shall excuse the people of the State from paying interest during those times; and what are they? The war and the reconstruction measures, putting upon the same footing with the war these measures claimed to be in the interest of liberty, of free government, of right, of justice, of everything that the republican party holds dear, and declaring that the horrors of the reconstruction period were equal to the horrors of the war, and therefore the people of the State of Virginia should no more pay interest during one of these periods than the other. That is the ground which the Riddleberger bill takes; and the man who announced that doctrine is now supported by the republicans in the Senate on account, as they say, of his support of a full vote, a fair count, and free ballot.

As I have been suffering under a cold, I do not wish to protract my remarks any longer than necessary, but I wish to put upon the records, standing by itself and separated from the rest of the bill, so that it may attract public attention, the fourteenth section of the Riddleberger bill. I ask the Secretary to read that section.

The Secretary read as follows:

The several tax collectors of this Commonwealth shall receive in discharge of the taxes, license taxes, and other dues, gold, silver, United States Treasury notes, national-bank currency, and the temporary-loan certificates as hereinafter provided, and nothing else: Provided, That in all cases in which an officer charged by law with the collection of revenue due the State shall take any step for the collection of the same, claimed to be due from any citizen or tax-payer, such person against whom such step is taken, if he concedes the same to be unjust or illegal, or against any statute, or to be unconstitutional, may pay the same under protest, and upon such payment the officer collecting the same shall pay such revenue into the State treasury, giving notice at the time of such payment to the treasurer that the same was paid under protest. The person so paying such revenue may, at any time within thirty days after making such payment, and not longer thereafter, sue the said officer so collecting such revenue in the county or corporation court in which said revenue was assessed and paid. If it be determined that the same was wrongfully collected, for any reason going to the merits of the same, then the court trying the case may certify of record that the same was wrongfully paid and ought to be refunded; and thereupon the auditor of public accounts shall issue his proper warrant for the same, which shall be paid in preference to other claims on the treasury. There shall be no other remedy in any case of the collection of revenue or the attempt to collect revenue illegally, or the attempt to collect revenue in funds only receivable by said officers under this law, the same being other and different funds than the tax-payer may tender or claim the right to pay than such as are herein provided, and no writ for the prevention of any revenue claim, or to hinder or delay the collection of the same, shall in anywise issue—either injunction, supersedeas, mandamus, prohibition, or any other writ or process whatever; but in all cases where for any reason any person shall claim that the revenue so collected of him was wrongfully or illegally collected the remedy for such person shall be as above provided, and in no other manner.

In all such cases if the courts shall certify of record that the officer defendant acted in good faith and diligently defended the action, the necessary cost incurred by him shall be taxed to and paid by the State as in criminal cases. The Commonwealth's attorney of the county or corporation in which suit is brought shall appear and represent the defense. In every case where judgment is rendered for the defendant a fee of $10 shall be taxed in favor of said attorney and against the plaintiff; and whenever the court shall refuse to certify the good faith and diligence of the officer defending the case, a like fee of $10 shall be taxed against the said officer. Any officer charged with the collection of revenue who shall receive payment thereof in anything other than that hereinbefore provided shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, in the discretion of the court, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to subject any officer of the State to any suit other than as hereinbefore provided for any refusal on his part to accept in payment of revenue due the State any kind or description of funds, security, or paper not authorized by this act.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That fourteenth section in substance takes away from the people their legal rights existing at the time the bill would have taken effect. If a tax is unjust, illegal, or unconstitutional, the party aggrieved has the right under the laws as they stand now to contest it by the legal remedies provided for the protection of the citizen; but this fourteenth section takes away from a poor man who is required to pay only one or two dollars of taxes the right to controvert it in the courts by the ordinary legal processes. No matter what his opinion or advice may be about it, no matter how much he may believe that it is illegal, that it is unjust, that it is unconstitutional, he nevertheless must pay it, and when paid his only chance for relief is to recover it by an action against the officers, which may be delayed months and years and which may cost fifty times or a hundred times more than the amount of the tax.

That is one mode in which this Riddleberger bill undertakes to protect the rights of the people of the State of Virginia, especially of the poor—to deprive them of existing legal rights and compel them to pay a tax, no matter how illegal or unconstitutional, giving them no remedy except the costly, protracted, troublesome, and perhaps inadequate one of a suit against the officer, which is a thing no poor man can afford to do; it is a denial of justice to him.

My colleague adverted the other day to what I said in regard to the unconstitutionality of the Riddleberger bill. He asked if it was unconstitutional for one reason or the other, reciting various alleged causes. It is unconstitutional in this, Mr. President: In 1871 the State of Virginia passed a funding bill which required that the coupons upon the bonds of the State should be received for taxes and for all dues and demands against the State of Virginia. In 1879 the Legislature passed another bill, called the McCulloch bill, in which the same provision was incorporated. Both those bills required that the State of Virginia should take the coupons upon the bonds funded under them in the payment of taxes and in the payment of debts and demands due the State. The Riddleberger bill abolishes all that. It declares that that feature shall not be observed. It substantially and was directly intended to repeal the McCulloch bill and the bill of 1871 in those respects. It is aimed exactly at that feature of those bills, and it does not propose to do this by the consent of the creditor at all; it does not ask him; it is a compulsory bill, and is intended to force the creditors of the State to surrender that right.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hartman vs. Greenhow, to which I have already referred, says this—the question was in regard to these very coupons, and the court speaking of the supreme court of appeals of the State of Virginia:

But the court said, among other answers to this, that no rightful power of the State was surrendered by the legislation, but simply a provision made for the payment of the debts of the State; that the annual accruing interest on the debt of the State was in all well-regulated governments deemed an essential part of their annual expenses, and was always annually provided for. The act only made provision for an annual appropriation of a portion of the revenue, derived from taxation, to the payment of existing debts; and such legislation could not be deemed a great stretch of power, when the organic law of the State not only contemplated the punctual annual payment of the interest of her entire debt, but imperatively required, on the creation of a debt, that a sinking fund should be at once established, to be applied solely to its extinction.

The cases above were cited by the court; and the provision of the funding act was shown, by reasoning perfectly conclusive, to be a contract founded upon valuable considerations and binding upon the State.

Under this act—

That is, the act of 1871 and the act of 1879—

a large number of the creditors of the State, holding bonds amounting, including interest thereon, to about thirty millions of dollars, surrendered them and took new bonds, with interest coupons annexed, for two-thirds of their amount and certificates for the balance. A contract was thus consummated between the State and the holders of the new bonds and the holders of the coupons, from the obligation of which she could not, without their consent, release herself by any subsequent legislation. She thus bound herself, not only to pay the bonds when they became due, but to receive the interest coupons from the bearer at and after their maturity, to their full amount, for any taxes or dues by him to the State. This receivability of the coupons for such taxes and dues was written on their face and accompanied them into whatever hands they passed. It constituted their chief value, and was the main consideration offered to the holders of the old bonds to surrender them and accept new bonds for two-thirds of their amount.

We have here the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring that the coupon feature of the McCulloch bill and of the funding bill of 1871 constitute a contract between the bondholder and the creditor, or the holder of the coupon, which could only be discharged by the consent of the creditors, and we have the Riddleberger bill, utterly disregarding the consent of the creditor, not even asking it. Therefore the Riddleberger bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, before I go any further I desire to advert briefly to one statement made by my colleague in regard to the arrears due the school fund of the State of Virginia. He said both in his speech on the floor, as I understood him, and in the printed interview which he embodied in his speech, that the State of Virginia is indebted to the school fund of the State $1,500,000 in round numbers; or, in other words, that funds which should have been applied to the schools of the State had been diverted to that amount and appropriated to other purposes. I intend to show that that is incorrect, and that there is no such sum due to the schools.

The first Legislature that assembled under the new constitution provided for the establishment of public schools. It began its session in October, 1869, but it was extended to the spring of 1870. The law could not go into effect until the latter part of the year 1870, and from that time to the present day it has been in force and operation. Any defalcation, therefore, or any plunder of the public-school fund must necessarily have occurred, if at all, from the year 1870 down to the present period. In the session of 1877–'78 the allegation was made that this plunder of the public-school fund had been accomplished and that large amounts had been diverted from the schools and appropriated to other purposes. To investigate this matter a committee was appointed, on which were Mr. Isaac C. Fowler, a friend of my colleague, and the editor of a readjuster paper, Mr. Lewis E. Harvie, another readjuster, a prominent man, and Mr. W. T. Taliaferro, of Norfolk, a debt-payer. I cannot recall the other names, but a majority were readjusters, and I shall take it for granted, without knowing the reason, that the object was to give the readjusters a fair opportunity of looking into this matter and making their own report. They made a report, and upon it the Legislature passed a law which Mr. Riddleberger was kind enough to publish in his paper and which he indorsed as most beneficent in its operation. This law was passed in the session of 1877–'78, and let us see what it is. I read the law as published, with approbation, in Mr. Riddleberger's paper, and his comments also:

> On Monday last, in the discussion at this place, Captain Paul claimed that the money recently paid by Auditor Massey to the schools, amounting to $160,000, was paid in pursuance of an act passed prior to the Henkel school bill, Judge Allen asserting that it was paid under the provisions of the Henkel bill. Below we give the bill in full under which these payments were made. It will be seen that Captain Paul was correct, and that this bill was passed one year before the Henkel bill was heard of.

Here is the bill, which I will read:

> An act requiring the auditor of public accounts to make quarterly payments to the second auditor on account of arrearages due the public-school fund.
